SEVENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who dost press the signet of eternity upon the fleeting moments of our life: Make us mindful of the sacred trust that is ours as again we invoke Thy blessing.

Grant to each one of us, confessing our sins unto Thee, that, being absolved of our transgressions, we may serve Thee with clean hands and pure hearts and minister to our fellow men according to Thy purpose, fettered only to Thy love. Remove all fear from our minds, that the clear stream of reason may flow into ever-widening channels, until words shall spring from the depth of truth and ceaseless striving inspired of Thee shall bring us nearer to perfection's goal. Endue us with the strength that is Thine, that we may feel the rapture of the high resolve to make each deed the measure of a man, and, striking at the root of wrong, may clear the Nation's highway for the feet of God. We ask it in our Savior's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 11, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in order to assure the presence of a quorum, I ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], caused by illness; and I further announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 1439. An act to provide for loans made necessary by floods or other catastrophes in the year 1937; and

S. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution to extend for a period of 2 years the guarantee by the United States of debentures issued by the Federal Housing Administrator.

SIGNING OF AN ENROLLED BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that, under authority of the order of the Senate of the 11th instant, he signed on that day the enrolled bill (S. 1439) to provide for loans made necessary by floods or other catastrophes in the year 1937, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

FELICITATIONS TO THE PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the municipal council of San Fernando, Romblon, P. I., extending congratulations to President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Vice President John N. Garner on their reelection to office, and also suggesting a reconsideration of the economic clauses of the so-called Tydings-McDuffie law relative to the Philippines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY IN FRENCH SENATE ON FLOOD DISASTERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the Senate of the French Republic, transmitting excerpts from the proceedings of a recent session of that Senate embodying addresses expressing deepest sympathy by its president and the Minister of State of France on the recent flood disasters in the United States, which, with the accompanying excerpts, was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION, EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON, AND ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY—SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 18)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, supplemental estimates of appropriations for salaries and expenses of the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and the Electric Home and Farm Authority for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF IN FLOOD-STRICKEN AREAS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation authorizing the President to allocate emergency relief funds to the Public Health Service for health and sanitation activities in the flood-stricken areas, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESERVE REQUIREMENTS OF FEDERAL RESERVE MEMBER BANKS (S. DOC. NO. 19)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 78 (submitted by Mr. NYE and agreed to on the 5th instant), certain information concerning the order of that Board increasing the reserve requirements of member banks after May 1, 1937, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORT ON TEXTILE INDUSTRIES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting copy of a report submitted to the President of the United States by the Commission entitled "The Textile Industries in the First Half of 1936—Part III—The Silk and Rayon Industry", which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORT OF FEDERAL PRISON INDUSTRIES, INC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Federal Prison Industries, Inc., transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the Board for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1936, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS—REORGANIZATION OF JUDICIAL BRANCH

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to say to the Senate that on Saturday, as the Chair recalls the day, the president of the Senate of Maine and the speaker of the House of Representatives of that State, with two of their colleagues from each body, came to the chamber of the Vice President, presented a memorial, and asked him to obtain permission to have it read by the clerk of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

Whereas we, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine, believe that the Constitution of the United States is the foundation of our liberty and that it should be amended only through the direct methods provided therein, openly and fairly by the submission of amendments to the legislatures or conventions of the 48 States of the Union after a Nation-wide discussion of the changes involved; and

Whereas we believe that the continuation of our representative democracy and constitutional government depends upon the complete separation and independence of the three branches of government, to wit, legislative, executive, and judicial; and

Whereas we regard the proposed changes in the laws affecting the Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal judiciary now advocated by the President of the United States as a covert attack upon the Constitution of the country whereby certain laws, the principles of which heretofore held to be in conflict with that great document, later may be enacted into the law by indirection through the control of the Court by the Chief Executive: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Senate and House of Representatives of the sovereign State of Maine, representing the people of Maine, urge you, the Seventy-fifth Congress of the United States, to uphold the Constitution and to protect the Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal judiciary from legislative and executive interference and control. Only by your so doing will the liberties of our citizens be safeguarded and the perils of personal government and dictatorship abhorrent to all free men and women be avoided; and be it further

Resolved, That a joint select committee of three on the part of the senate and three on the part of the house, including the president of the senate and the speaker of the house, be appointed to deliver personally and in hand to the Congress of the United States a duly authenticated copy hereof, attested by the secretary of state.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HATCH subsequently said: Mr. President, a very interesting resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine has been placed in the RECORD today. As a matter of historical interest, I ask at this time that another resolution or declaration by the State of Maine, adopted shortly after the Dred Scott decision, may be read by the clerk. I further ask that in the RECORD this resolution may immediately follow the resolution which has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Whereas such extra-judicial opinion subordinates the political power and interests of the American people to the cupidity and ambition of a few thousand slaveholders, * * *: Therefore

Resolved, That the extra-judicial opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott is not binding in law or conscience upon the Government or citizens of the United States, and that it is of an import so alarming and dangerous as to demand the instant and emphatic reprobation of the country.

Resolved, That the Supreme Court of the United States should, by peaceful and constitutional measures, be so reconstituted as to relieve it from the domination of a sectional faction * * *.

[The foregoing resolution is taken from the work American Government and Politics, by Charles A. Beard. It may be found at p. 88.]

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, a few days ago the Legislature of the State of Indiana, by a vote of 3 to 1 in the House of Representatives and 4 to 1 in the Senate, adopted a resolution approving the President's proposal to reorganize the Federal courts. I now send to the desk a copy of the resolution referred to, and ask unanimous consent that it may be read and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution concerning the recommendations of the President relating to the reorganization of the Federal judiciary

Whereas in a recent message to Congress the President made recommendations affecting the structure, the method of selecting the personnel, and the procedure of the Federal courts; and

Whereas those recommendations insure a more efficient and higher quality of administration of justice in our Federal courts generally; and

Whereas in respect to the Supreme Court of the United States they assure the highly desirable results both of retaining for the Court the invaluable asset of enlightened experience of the older Justices and of bringing to the Court the equally invaluable asset of fresh views, closer contacts with and more sympathetic understanding of the realities of current economic, social, and political problems, and their relation to the exercise by Congress of its legitimate powers under the Constitution of the United States: Therefore

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the house of representatives concurring), That the United States Senators and several Representatives from this State are hereby urged to support the recommendations of the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, to the end that our Federal courts may deserve the continued respect and confidence of the American people and serve their constitutional purpose as an indispensable instrumentality in the whole life of the Republic.

SEC. 2. That the secretary of the senate is hereby instructed to send a copy of this resolution to each of the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present a letter received by me from the president of the Bar Association of the City of Boston, Mass., together with a resolution of the council of that bar association, which I ask may be treated as a petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter, with the accompanying resolution, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BAR ASSOCIATION OF THE CITY OF BOSTON,
Boston, Mass., February 13, 1937.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
The Carlton, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I am enclosing herewith a certified copy of resolutions unanimously adopted by the council of the Bar Association of the City of Boston today. The members of the council were anxious that I should get this copy as early as possible to you as the senior Senator of the Commonwealth and consequently the leader of the Massachusetts delegation. Copies will be sent by the secretary of the association to the other members of the delegation. I most earnestly hope that you may see your way clear to voice the sentiment of this Commonwealth against any legislation making it possible to pack the Supreme Court.

With personal regards, I am,
Faithfully yours,

BUCKLEY W. WANES, President.

Unanimous resolution of the council of the Bar Association of the City of Boston at an adjourned meeting on February 13, 1937, called specially to consider the effect of the proposals of the President of the United States accompanying his message of February 5, 1937, to the Congress

The President's message, in those respects which relate to the Supreme Court of the United States, is so phrased as to convey the understanding to the people that he seeks to have the Court enlarged in order that it may deal efficiently with matters before it. This is neither the purpose nor the effect of the legislation which he asks the Congress to enact. The Court is abreast of its work. At the adjournment of Court for the summer recess of 1936 not a single case which was then ready for argument remained unargued or undecided. No enlargement is necessary, and the proposed act does not assure any enlargement unless the President is unable to control the Court at its present size by forcing the resignations of six Justices. This is clear from a consideration of the act which the President has submitted.

By the terms of this act the Congress does not itself increase the number of Justices on the Supreme Court. The act contains no expression or implication of congressional determination that the Supreme Court ought to contain more than nine Justices.

The act provides that if all of these six Justices resign within 6 months after its passage the Court shall remain at nine Justices; but that if any one or more of them continues to serve thereafter the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint one additional judge for each judge who has not resigned within the prescribed time or before another is nominated, and that the membership of the Court shall be permanently enlarged to the extent of the number so appointed. This means that when a Justice who remains over the 6-month period subsequently resigns or dies the President has the duty to appoint a successor to him, notwithstanding the prior enlarging appointment already made. Thus it is apparent that the individual action of each elder Justice with respect to resignation or retention of office will determine whether the Court shall be composed of 9 or 15 or some intermediate number, and this without any further action by the Congress. In this way, therefore, the Congress will surrender to the elder Justices the power to determine the membership of the Court.

In determining this membership the elder Justices, because of a conviction that nine is a more efficient number for the work of the Court than a larger number, may feel forced to resign. So by indirection the President will accomplish his purpose to force off the Court able and independent Justices.

These considerations compel the conclusion that what the President is seeking is not an increase in the membership of the Court nor to establish a retirement age for the Justices, but the power to control its decisions by packing the Court. To vest such power in the President would render the judiciary subservient to the Executive, thus destroying its essential independence and violating the fundamental principle of the Constitution that the legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of the Government shall be forever completely independent of one another.

This wise division of powers was made to guarantee to the people of the United States that there could never be an encroachment by any one of the three branches of government upon the liberties of the people. To break down this division is to destroy the existing assurance against an interference by the legislative branch or the executive branch with the freedom of religion, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the fundamental rights of the people of the several States to retain inviolate every power which they have not expressly delegated to the Federal Government.

If in any nation the judiciary be subservient to the executive—whether that executive be king, dictator, or president—even-handed justice for the poor and the uninfluential becomes uncertain and oppression by the powerful inevitably follows. Our forefathers abhorred judicial subservience for they had suffered from it. Their abhorrence manifested itself in the provisions of the Constitution which place all the judicial power of the United States in the courts and provide that the judges thereof shall hold their offices during good behavior.

No citizen can confidently rely on the equal protection of the laws, and no State can be certain that it will not forcibly and against its will be deprived of its own sovereign powers unless the Supreme Court of the United States remains, as it has always existed, a tribunal free, independent, and uncontrolled.

If the time should ever come when the people desire that the Justices of the Supreme Court no longer should exercise full judicial power, but that their decisions should be inoperative if displeasing either to the executive or to the legislative branch of the Government, they can amend the Constitution to that end. President Washington, in his Farewell Address, said, "If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for this is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

An attempt in Congress to pass a law which is contrary to the Constitution is not an act of Congress, but is an effort of less than 532 men to usurp powers never given them by the people. An announcement of this by the Court does not justify any assertion that the Court is blocking the Congress.

We hold these principles to be incontrovertible and an attack upon them to be subversive to the fundamentals of free government: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the council of the Bar Association of the city of Boston urges the Congress of the United States to reject the proposals contained in the President's message of February 5, 1937, and in the bill accompanying it, insofar as they relate to the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Resolved, That this resolution be submitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States for their consideration.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

House Joint Memorial 2

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the United States Government under the Emergency Federal Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, and with subsequent amendments, was authorized to grant commissioner loans to any one farmer not exceeding the sum of $7,500; and

Whereas the rate of interest on such loans was established at the rate of 5 percent per annum; and

Whereas most of these loans were made for a period of 13 years with no payment required on principal during the first 3 years of said loan; and

Whereas the principal of said loan in most cases is payable during the following 10 years, one-tenth each year, plus interest at the rate of 5 percent per annum on unpaid balances; and

Whereas the income from farm crops is not sufficient in most cases to meet such payments; and

Whereas the rate of interest paid on most of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds, through which the Government farm loan, known as land bank commissioner loans, were financed, bear interest at the rate of less than 3 percent per annum: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon hereby does petition the Congress of the United States to enact into law some legislation providing that land bank commissioner mortgages of record or made hereafter, shall be amortized over a term of years, so that the payment of principal and interest shall not be greater than 5 percent of the amount of the original loan, with interest on the unpaid balance not to exceed the rate of 3 percent per annum; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon is hereby directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, Washington, D. C., a copy to each Representative and Senator from the State of Oregon, also a copy hereof to the speaker of the house and president of the senate of each State legislature in the United States which shall convene during the year 1937.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Joint Resolution 8

Joint resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the United States Congress to take immediate steps in affording relief to the flood sufferers of the Ohio River Valley

Whereas a condition unparalleled in the history of the State of Ohio has brought unheard of suffering and destitution to the flood victims of the Ohio River; and

Whereas the magnitude of this catastrophe is of such extent that the State of Ohio cannot alone cope with the situation; and

Whereas it is felt by the members of the Ohio General Assembly that unless immediate relief is afforded by the Federal Government in rehabilitating the flood-stricken area by the granting of instantaneous relief, a public-health crisis is impending which may involve the entire Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the general assembly, That the members of the ninety-second general assembly hereby memorialize the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to immediately take steps to afford relief to the flood sufferers of the Ohio River valley by utilizing every agency of the Federal Government to avert the impending crisis; and be it further

Resolved, That the Federal Government immediately send Army engineers, physicians, and public-health specialists and such others as may be deemed necessary to carry out an immediate rehabilitation program on a scale proportionate to the magnitude of this disaster; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the United States Senators and Members of Congress from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 14

Whereas the great loss of human life and the property damage resulting to the people of Tennessee living in the Cumberland River Valley and on its tributaries and in the Mississippi Valley from the ravages of the recent floods in those streams have been so great as to shock the people of the entire Nation; and

Whereas the people living in the Tennessee River Valley and on its tributaries have suffered no loss of life and practically no financial loss on account of the said flood, the rainfall being as great over the Tennessee River Valley as over the valley of the Cumberland River and other parts of Tennessee; and

Whereas the developments made on the Tennessee River and its tributaries by the Tennessee Valley Authority were the sole protection of citizens and property within the Tennessee River Valley and its tributaries, thus furnishing a striking example of the efficiency of the great program of President Roosevelt to improve the navigation of these interstate streams, protect the soil from erosion, and encourage reforestation, and insure agricultural rehabilitation and power development for the benefit of the people of the territory affected, and, indirectly, for the benefit of the people of the Nation as a whole, thus vindicating the wisdom of President Roosevelt and the Congress in establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority; and

Whereas it is now manifest to every intelligent person that the Cumberland River should be developed along the same lines as the Tennessee River projects are being developed, and that this development is a pressing and urgent need of the people of the State of Tennessee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Tennessee (the house concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memoralized by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee to proceed at the earliest practical moment to enact legislation along the lines of the Logan bill, which passed the United States Senate over a year ago, that the Cumberland River and its tributaries and territory adjacent thereto be attached to and become a part of the Tennessee Valley Authority and that the Congress appropriate an amount sufficient to make the necessary improvements on said stream; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the senate transmit to the Vice President of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Senators MCKELLAR and BACHMAN and to each of the Congressmen from the State of Tennessee copies of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States for the passage of the legislation for the creation and establishment of the Townsend recovery plan, and for benefits to be paid to all persons over the age of 60 years

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas there exists among employers of labor a widespread policy by which persons over 45 years of age, willing and anxious to earn their livelihood, are deprived of the opportunity of receiving employment, thus placing many such persons in a position of depending either upon friends or relatives or on public charity; and

Whereas many of the persons thus deprived of an opportunity to earn their support are, by means of this policy adopted and enforced by employers of labor, unable to support themselves by means of their own effort; and

Whereas our social and economic welfare demand of the American people as a whole that those who, through no fault of their own, are thus deprived of the opportunity to earn a livelihood be placed in a condition where their morale be sustained and they be neither made indigents or partakers of public charity; and

Whereas the burden of creating and maintaining the social and economic welfare is of greater magnitude than the State of Montana, in common with other States, is able to carry on; and

Whereas there exists not only a widespread demand of persons over 60 years of age for the passage of legislation which will permit them to maintain their self-respect but there also exists an unusually strong demand of persons under the age of 60 years that those who have pioneered in the building and development of our country be justly and adequately provided for in their declining years: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Montana (the senate concurring), That we do hereby petition the Congress of the United States of America for the passage of the Townsend recovery plan into law, the said plan being deemed just and equitable to all persons over the age of 60 years; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana, and they and each of them be requested to use all honorable means within their power to bring about the enactment of the Townsend recovery plan into law.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Senate of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas this State and all the other States of the United States have been virtually deprived of the power to tax national banks by reason of interpretations of the Federal statute governing the States in such taxation; and

Whereas the States are required to tax State banks upon the same basis as national banks, because if State banks were taxed upon any higher basis than national banks, State banks would be forced out of business; and

Whereas most of the legislative bodies of the United States have memorialized Congress to so amend the Federal law as to permit the States to tax national banks provided that the tax on national banks should not be at a higher rate than the tax imposed by the State upon State banks: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota, That the Congress of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully requested to so amend the Federal law as to permit the States to tax national banks provided that the tax on such banks shall not be at a higher rate than the tax imposed by the State upon State banks; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate at Washington, D. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas the problem of the security of employment and the security of the aged have become leading public issues; and

Whereas the people of the State of North Dakota have become conscious of the need of Federal legislation aiming to make dependent old age more secure; and

Whereas many thousands of the people of this State have endorsed and recommended a plan known as the Townsend recovery plan, tending toward the accomplishment of these aims and the security of persons of this State in their old age; and

Whereas it is imperative that our younger people may find employment and thus put an end, in a large measure, to our present unemployment situation, and that the active and wide increase of buying and selling to result from the operation of the Townsend recovery plan bill will help banish poverty and bring back prosperity to our country in general: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of this twenty-fifth legislative assembly (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully memorialized and urged to pass the said Townsend recovery plan bill thereby making it the Federal law of the land, if, as, and when the same is presented for its passage; be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in the Congress of the United States be, and hereby are, requested to take such necessary steps as will insure the immediate passage of the aforesaid Townsend recovery plan bill upon its presentation to the Congress of the United States, and that copies of this memorial be forwarded forthwith to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, protesting against the ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. FRAZIER.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas press reports have indicated that the Commission attending the Pan American Peace Conference is favorable to the importation of unsterilized meats and meat products from certain South American countries; and

Whereas it has been stated that foot-and-mouth disease does not exist in certain areas of South America; and

Whereas it is known that foot-and-mouth disease and other transmissible diseases of livestock which do not exist in the United States are ever prevalent in those South American countries; and

Whereas the prevention and control of livestock diseases in those South American countries is not comparable to the standards of the United States and is in fact practically negligible; and

Whereas the United States has spent millions of dollars in the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease brought into this country through livestock products of foreign origin; and

Whereas the livestock industry in the United States had likewise suffered losses totaling millions of dollars from outbreaks of foot-and-mouth diseases; and

Whereas an embargo is now in effect on importations of livestock and unsterilized livestock products from these South American countries; and

Whereas the raising of such an embargo would immediately and seriously jeopardize the Nation's livestock industry as well as the public health of its citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, That this body vigorously opposes any modifications of existing Federal laws and regulations governing the importation of livestock or unsterilized livestock products from any foreign country harboring foot-and-mouth disease or any other transmissible diseases of livestock which do not now exist in the United States; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State at Washington, D. C., the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 16

Whereas the present sanitary regulations prohibit importations, into the United States of live animals and fresh meats from any country in which foot-and-mouth disease exists; and

Whereas such regulations were found necessary for the protection of the livestock industry after several disastrous outbreaks in the State of Texas were found to be the result of importations from countries in which foot-and-mouth disease existed; and

Whereas Federal and State Governments have spent millions of dollars in eradicating foot-and-mouth disease and to prevent its spread in the United States; and

Whereas it is necessary that present regulations be maintained in order to prevent the introduction and spread of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States; and

Whereas the pending Argentine Sanitary Convention proposes to modify the present sanitary regulations so as to permit importations from certain parts of Argentina which are alleged to be free of foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas foot-and-mouth disease exists, and has existed, for many years in large parts of Argentina, where no system of eradication is pursued and control methods are not such as to prevent its spread; and

Whereas importations of live animals or fresh meats from any part of Argentina would endanger the livestock industry of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That these bodies vigorously oppose the ratification by the United States Senate of the Argentine Sanitary Convention, or any measure which proposes to change the present regulations governing importations of live animals and fresh meats from any country which harbors foot-and-mouth disease; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Governor to the President of the United States; the Secretary of State at Washington, D. C.; the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives; the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States; and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also presented the petition of John Galasso, of Detroit, Mich., praying for continuance of the modernization work and operations under the Federal Housing Administration, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented petitions of Local No. 1052, Brotherhood of P. D. and P. of A., and former employees of the Flint Trolley Coach Co., of Flint, Mich., praying for an investigation of strike conditions connected with the present Trolley Coach Co. strike in Flint, Mich., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Colonel Cornelius Van Dyck Chapter of the Sons of the American Revolution, Schenectady, N. Y., protesting against the adoption of any plan or proposal to change or weaken the established functions of a branch of the Government without due deliberative action by the citizens through the method of Constitutional amendment, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Flint (Mich.) Association of Bus and Trolley Coach Employees, favoring the making of an appropriation of $500,000 for continuing as a permanent Senate committee the so-called Civil Liberties subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented the memorial of Mary Logan Tucker, Washington, D. C., past national president, Dames of the Loyal Legion, and national chairman of the National Society United States Daughters of 1812, etc., and also memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan and a citizen of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the reorganization of the judicial branch of the Government, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUSSELL presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Whereas there has been introduced into the National Congress a bill known as the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill; and

Whereas this bill is receiving serious consideration by the National Congress; and

Whereas this bill is intended to give Federal aid to the support of public education in the various States and Territories of our Nation without in any way giving to the Federal Government any control of our public schools; and

Whereas this bill will go a long way toward equalizing the educational opportunity given to the children of the various States and Territories of our Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That we favor the passage of the Harrison-Black-Fletcher bill by the National Congress; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to each member of the Georgia delegation in our National Congress.

Mr. FRAZIER presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas it is indicated that there is a determination of certain Government officials to secure a ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention; and

Whereas any attempt to raise the embargo on animal products from Argentina, or any province thereof, would subject the livestock of the United States to a constant menace of foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas past experience shows that outbreaks caused by such importations have caused millions of dollars' damage and consequent depletion of livestock, and have been a source of great economic loss: And therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring herein), That we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to protest the ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention and urge the Members thereof to work for the continuance of the present embargo against every country where the disease is known to exist and that there shall be no experimentation at the expense of the health and safety of our livestock; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress of the United States, and to each Member thereof from this State, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to Senator Hotchkiss and Senator Headlee, senate chamber, Denver, Colo.

NATIONAL DEFENSE—PETITION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a petition from the chairman of the legislative committee of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, Department of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVE OFFICERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, MASSACHUSETTS DEPARTMENT,
Boston, February 2, 1937.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: To you, a recognized friend of our aims, we endorse and recommend the following national-defense measures and program, deemed feasible, as well as essential, to the preservation of our national welfare.

Sufficient appropriations to train annually 30,000 eligible Reserve officers for a 14-day period of active duty;

Active-duty training over a continued period for flying cadet graduates;

Continuation of funds to implement terms of Thomason Act;

Maintenance and development of R. O. T. C., with annual field training for 8,000;

Training of all qualified applicants for C. M. T. C.;

Support of rifle and pistol matches, culminating in the national matches at Camp Perry;

The continuation of C. C. C. with its affiliation with the Army;

Adequate Navy, with sufficient Naval and Marine Corps Reserves;

A Regular Army of 165,000 enlisted men and 14,000 active officers;

A National Guard of 210,000 enlisted men, with a proper proportion of officers, having 48 armory drills and a 15-day encampment annually.

May we be assured of your continued assistance and cooperation?

Respectfully yours,

DAVID A. PFROMM,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

CIRCULARIZATION AGAINST PROPOSED SUPREME COURT ENLARGEMENT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter and ask unanimous consent that it may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and read, as follows:

TENNESSEE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION,
Nashville, Tenn., February 11, 1937.

To the Manufacturers of Tennessee:

Each of you know what's going on in Washington with reference to proposed changes in the Supreme Court. We have such high regard for the judicial department of our Government that we do not want to see our Federal courts disturbed. If you feel the same way about it, we want to ask you to do the following things immediately:

First. If you have not already done so, please wire or write your Congressman and your two Senators protesting in most vigorous language possible against any tampering with the Supreme Court of the United States. Also persuade as many of your friends as possible to do likewise.

Second. The Tennessee Legislature has under consideration a resolution calling upon the Tennessee representatives in Congress to vote against tampering with the Supreme Court. Please wire immediately your State senator, representative, and floater, if you have one, to vote for this resolution.

We are giving below Tennessee's delegation in Congress. The two Senators should be addressed at the Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., and the Congressmen at the House Office Building.

Sincerely yours,

C. C. GILBERT, Secretary.

Senator KENNETH MCKELLLAR; Senator NATHAN L. BACHMAN; First District, Hon. B. CARROLL REECE; Second District, Hon. J. WILL TAYLOR; Third District, Hon. SAM D. MCREYNOLDS; Fourth District, Hon. J. R. MITCHELL; Fifth District, Hon. RICHARD M. ATKINSON; Sixth District, Hon. CLARENCE W. TURNER; Seventh District, Hon. HERRON PEARSON; Eighth District, Hon. JERE COOPER; Ninth District, Hon. WALTER CHANDLER.

P. S.—Mr. Edgerton is writing the constituency of the Southern States Industrial Council, consisting of 16,000 manufacturers, making a similar request.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 975) to amend the act approved February 7, 1913, so as to remove restrictions as to the use of the Little Rock Confederate Cemetery, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 89) thereon.

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1125) to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain portions of Anastasia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., and for other purposes", approved August 27, 1935, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 90) thereon.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD, DRUGS, AND COSMETICS—REPORT OF COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 5) to prevent the adulteration, misbranding, and false advertisement of food, drugs, devices, and cosmetics in interstate, foreign, and other commerce subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of safeguarding the public health, preventing deceit upon the purchasing public, and for other purposes reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 91) thereon.

PRINTING OF REPORT OF DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION (S. DOC. NO. 20)

Mr. HAYDEN. From the Committee on Printing, I report a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 80) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Thirty-ninth Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended April 1, 1936, be printed as a Senate document.

ADJUSTMENT OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES' SALARIES—AMENDMENT

Mr. McCARRAN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 741) to amend the act of March 4, 1923, entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and within the field services, and amendments thereto", which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and ordered to be printed.

UNIFORM TRANSPORTATION RATES ON A MILEAGE BASIS

Mr. RUSSELL submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 6), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas it is the policy of the Congress to encourage and promote the equal development of every section of the United States; and

Whereas the existing rates of transportation in force with respect to carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, have a tendency to deter such development in certain sections of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that in the administration of such act it would be to the best interests of the people of the United States to have a uniform scale of transportation rates on a mileage basis which would apply equally in all sections of the United States.

INVESTIGATION OF RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 81), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the Resettlement Administration created by Executive Order No. 7027, dated April 30, 1935, has had transferred to it by subsequent Executive and administrative orders the property, functions, and funds of various other governmental agencies, including the land program of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, the Division of Subsistence Homesteads of the Department of the Interior, the Land Policy Section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and the Rural Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration; and

Whereas the duties and purposes of the Resettlement Administration, as prescribed by the President, are—

(a) To administer approved projects involving rural rehabilitation, relief in stricken agricultural areas, and resettlement of destitute or low-income families from rural and urban areas, including the establishment, maintenance, and operation, in such connection, of communities in rural and suburban areas;

(b) To initiate and administer a program of approved projects with respect to soil erosion, stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, flood control, and other useful projects;

(c) To make loans, as authorized under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, to finance, in whole or in part, the purchase of farm lands and necessary equipment by farmers, farm tenants, croppers, or farm laborers; and

Whereas the Resettlement Administration has expended large sums for the claimed purpose of carrying out the various activities it has undertaken and has a large number of employees in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and

Whereas it is alleged that the expenditures in connection with many of such activities have been unwarranted and excessive and that the benefits derived from such activities have been wholly incommensurate with the expenditures made; and

Whereas it is alleged that many other projects of the Resettlement Administration are contemplated which involve further large expenditures of public funds: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of four Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized to make a full and complete investigation of the activities of the Resettlement Administration, the total amount of public funds that have been made available to it for expenditure and the amounts actually expended for various projects, the number and salaries of its officers and employees, and its contemplated future activities and the expenditures to be made therefor. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable, but not later than July 1, 1937, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first bill in order on the calendar.

RESOLUTION AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as first in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. MCNARY. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 21) directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

QUALIFICATIONS OF PRACTITIONERS OF LAW IN DISTRICT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 204) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I think an explanation is desirable, and I am sure the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will be glad to give it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to comply with the request of the Senator from Oregon. An identical bill textually passed the Senate at the last session. It was reintroduced at this session, considered by the committee, and unanimously reported. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] a few days ago objected to the consideration of the bill at that time merely because he desired to make inquiry as to whether it would prevent attorneys not residents of the District from appearing here specially. I informed him that that matter had been taken care of, and he is now entirely satisfied.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, is that agreeable to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. GIBSON. It is agreeable to me, but I understand that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has some objection to it.

Mr. KING. I have not been advised of any objection on his part.

Mr. GIBSON. I thought he objected to it on the last call of the calendar.

Mr. KING. I am not so advised. If there is no objection otherwise, I hope the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 1, line 8, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for"; on page 2, line 4, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for"; and in line 8, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 218a. No person who is not a member of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia shall engage in the practice of law, or any branch thereof, in the District of Columbia; nor shall any partnership, corporation, association, or firm engage in the practice of law, or any branch thereof, in the District of Columbia, except associations, partnerships, and firms all of the members of which are members of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

A member of the bar of the highest court of any State, not recorded as disbarred upon the membership rolls of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to represent parties or interests in the courts of the District of Columbia in causes which arise from time to time affecting parties and subject matter without the District of Columbia. No court of the District of Columbia shall enforce against any such member of the bar of the highest court of any State any rule promulgated by such court which would require that there be joined of record associate counsel having an office in the District of Columbia or providing for the exclusion of such member of the bar from practice in such causes if the party represented shall file, at the time counsel enters his appearance, with the clerk having jurisdiction consent that service upon said clerk shall be service upon said party and his counsel.

Mr. KING. All the amendments are made necessary by the change of the name of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 15, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "United States District Court" and insert the words "District Court of the United States"; in line 21, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "United States District Court" and insert the words "District Court of the United States"; on page 5, line 1, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "United States District Court" and insert the words "District Court of the United States"; in line 15, after the words "bar of the", strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for"; and in line 20, after the words "bar of the", to strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 218d. Nothing contained in section 218a, 218b, or 218c shall prevent persons or partnerships who are now or shall hereafter be admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, or the Court of Claims from practicing before the same, or prevent them from using the words forbidden to be used by section 218b when such words are used (1) in connection with other words stating the court or courts before which they are then so admitted to practice, or (2) in their practice before said courts or any of them; nor shall anything in the said sections contained (a) prevent persons or partnerships who are now or shall hereafter be authorized or permitted by any department, commission, bureau, agency, or other authority of the United States or of the District of Columbia to practice before the same from doing so, or (b) apply to the use by them of words forbidden by section 218b when such words are used (1) in connection with other words stating the department, commission, bureau, agency, authority, or one or more or all of them, before which they are so authorized or permitted to practice, or (2) in their practice before the same; nor shall anything in said section contained prevent any person, partnership, or firm, now or hereafter registered by the United State Patent Office, to practice before it, and not a member of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, from performing any and all of the services incident to patent, trademark, copyright, and unfair-competition practice before and out of the Patent Office and out of court; nor prevent any member of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, who is also a member of or an associate of a firm or partnership which is registered to practice before the United States Patent Office, but all the members of which are not members of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, from practicing law to the full extent of his authority as a member of said bar, or prevent any person from acting as attorney for the United States Government while actually engaged by it so to do, nor shall anything in the said sections referred to be construed so as to prevent any title insurance company while authorized to carry on its business in the District of Columbia from examining, abstracting, reporting upon, certifying, guaranteeing, or insuring titles to real estate, settling sales, conveyances, and exchanges thereof, or doing conveyancing work in connection therewith: Provided, That all conveyancing prepared or noted by such title insurance companies shall be under the direction of a member of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and each certification of, or opinion relating to, title to real estate, made by any such title insurance company shall be over the signature of its attorney or title officer, who shall be a member of the bar of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 7, to strike out the words "Supreme Court of" and insert the words "District Court of the United States for", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 218f. Every person, corporation, and association who or which shall violate any provisions of section 218a, or 218c shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court, and the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia and the police court of the District of Columbia shall have concurrent jurisdiction of all prosecutions under this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 740) to provide for the issuance of renewable 4-year term contracts to qualified star-route contractors and subcontractors, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has an objection to the amendments in the bill, and for that reason I ask that it go over for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. POPE subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to ask what action was taken on Senate bill 740, to provide for the issuance of renewable 4-year term contracts to qualified star-route contractors and subcontractors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill went over.

The bill (S. 1116) to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, to permit retired officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to hold civil office in any Territory of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I have an agreement with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that this bill shall go over pending investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1280) to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes", was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That bill may go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CREDIT INSURANCE UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1228) to amend the National Housing Act, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (a) of section 6 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Administrator is authorized and empowered, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to insure banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building and loan associations, installment lending companies, and other such financial institutions, heretofore or hereafter approved by the Administrator as eligible for credit insurance, against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit, and purchases of obligations representing loans and advances of credit, made by them subsequent to the date this section takes effect and prior to July 1, 1939, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that the emergency no longer exists, for the purpose of financing, by the owners of real property or by lessees thereof under a lease for a period of not less than 1 year, the restoration, rehabilitation, rebuilding, and replacement of improvements on such real property and equipment and machinery thereon which were damaged or destroyed by earthquake, conflagration, tornado, cyclone, hurricane, flood, or other catastrophe in the years 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, or 1939, either on the same site or on a new site in the same locality where the damaged or destroyed property was located. The Administrator is authorized to grant insurance under this section, as amended, to any such financial institution up to 20 percent of the total amount of loans, advances of credit, and purchases made by such financial institution for such purposes, and any insurance reserve accumulated by any such financial institution under section 2 of this title shall be applicable to the payment of any losses sustained by it as a result of loans, advances of credit, or purchases insured under this section."

SEC. 2. The third sentence of subsection (a) of section 2 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "The total liability incurred by the Administrator for all insurance heretofore and hereafter granted under this section and section 6, as amended, shall not exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that measure.

Mr. BORAH. I was about to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An explanation of the bill is requested. It was reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY].

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this bill simply extends to 1939 the provisions of an act which Congress passed last year to authorize the Federal Housing Administrator to guarantee certain loans made by lending institutions to replace losses resulting from floods. It increases the amount of the guarantee from 10 percent to 20 percent. Otherwise, it is merely an extension of the law that expired on the 1st of January. It is an emergency matter resulting from the damage done by the floods.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry. I think we are justified in the assumption that within a short time we shall have before us a flood-control bill which may deal with this question and make provision for relief.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will say that this bill has nothing to do with the control of floods. This bill is to help persons who have suffered damage to their property as a result of the floods.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask whether that measure would have any provision for relief such as that provided in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the problems are entirely different. This bill is for the relief of persons who have been damaged by the floods which have already occurred.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3) to regulate commerce in firearms was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like to have that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1173) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved June 22, 1936, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. May we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should not like to see that bill passed without an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An explanation of the bill is requested.

Mr. BORAH. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRODUCTS OF FISHING INDUSTRY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1406) to authorize distribution of products of the fishing industry, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title I of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936, approved February 11, 1936, is amended by inserting in the last proviso of the third paragraph under the subcaption "Miscellaneous" under the caption "Department of Agriculture", after the words "agricultural commodities" the following: "(including fish and shellfish)".

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah demands an explanation. The bill was reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WALSH. A bill has recently passed the Senate permitting the Department of Agriculture to purchase fish in the same manner that it purchased agricultural commodities, and the products thereof, including poultry, meat, and all the products of agriculture.

Fish is one of the food products that the Department has no authority to purchase. A bill has already been enacted giving such authority as to fish to the Department of Agriculture. The Comptroller General ruled that though the Department of Agriculture may purchase agricultural products it may not distribute them, and therefore additional authority to distribute has been given by authorizing the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to distribute agricultural products.

This bill is to permit the same to be done in the case of fish. It is an amendment to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation Act permitting fish to be distributed for relief the same as other agricultural products.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is there any limitation upon the duration of the measure?

Mr. WALSH. It is the same as the limitation with regard to agricultural products.

Mr. KING. What is the limitation of time fixed in the case of that act, if the Senator recalls?

Mr. WALSH. I do not recall, but it is approximately 2 years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the pending bill apply both to fresh fish and to canned fish?

Mr. WALSH. It does; also frozen and shellfish.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I interrupted the Senator because of the inquiry of the Senator from Utah, who asked if there is a limitation upon the time in which this action may be taken.

The original act states that it must be done during the fiscal years 1936 and 1937. The authority for distribution to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is confined to those 2 years, so the authority here given will be likewise limited.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator that fish is practically the only known food product that is not included in the distributions by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Mr. KING. Is this bill regarded as a relief measure?

Mr. WALSH. It is; exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1441) to authorize the establishment of a permanent instruction staff at the United States Coast Guard Academy was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we should like to have an explanation of that bill. In the absence of an explanation, let it go over.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1442) to enable Coast Guard officers to purchase articles of ordnance property for use in the public service in the same manner as such property may be purchased by officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the case of that bill, also, an explanation is desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

GREAT LAKES EXPOSITION

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) providing for a continuance of the participation of the United States in the Great Lakes Exposition in the State of Ohio in 1937, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States continue its participation in the Great Lakes Exposition in the State of Ohio during the year 1937.

SEC. 2. The provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Great Lakes Exposition to be held in the State of Ohio during the year 1936, and authorizing the President to invite the Dominion of Canada to participate therein, and for other purposes", approved April 25, 1936, are hereby extended and made applicable to the continuance of the participation of the United States in such exposition in 1937.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $175,000, which shall be in addition to the unexpended balance of the sum heretofore appropriated for carrying out the provisions of such joint resolution of April 25, 1936.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the calendar.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, at this time I desire to say a few words in memory of the late Susan B. Anthony. Today is the anniversary of her birth.

Mr. President, in 1897 Susan B. Anthony wrote a letter to the judges of the Idaho Supreme Court about a decision that had just been rendered by that court. She said:

> On behalf of the suffrage women of the United States, I thank you for the decision you have rendered. I had studied over the clause a great deal and felt that if your judgments were biased by the precedents and prejudices which had controlled the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the different States, upon the extension of rights to women, you certainly would give the narrow interpretation. Instead of that, for the first time in the history of our judiciary the broadest and most liberal interpretation possible has been given.

The clause of the constitution referred to provided that an amendment to the constitution could be adopted by a majority vote of the electors. The question decided was whether the proposed amendment required a majority of all the votes cast or only a majority of those cast on the amendment. The court held that a majority of those cast on the amendment was all that was required and that the amendment had been approved by the people.

This was merely an incident in the long battle waged by Miss Anthony for equal suffrage. For more than 50 years she devoted her rare gifts to this cause. Until her death at the age of 87 years, she pursued her work with a singleness of purpose and a courage that have few equals in all history. She kept the spirit of youth to the end of her days. A popular writer of the day had this to say of her:

> Without any special relay of the theories on the subject, Miss Susan B. Anthony discovered early in life the secret of imperishable youth and consistently increasing happiness—a secret that may be translated as personal devotion to a noble purpose; to devote one's self to something higher than self—this is the answer of the ages to those who would find the source of an immortal energy and enjoyment.

Her endurance, her energy of body and mind, amazed those who knew her.

At the time of her birth on February 15, 1820, 117 years ago today, women were definitely stamped with a badge of inferiority. They were unable to enjoy the advantages and opportunities open to the least deserving of men. They labored under economic, legal, and social disabilities that were little better than slavery.

It was only a short time before her birth that there appeared in the Pennsylvania Gazette an advertisement which read as follows:

> To be sold: A healthy young Dutch woman, fit for town or country business; about 18 years old; can spin well; she speaks good English; and has about 5 years to serve.

A married woman was under absolute control of her husband. Blackstone had stated the common law as follows:

> By marriage the husband and wife are one person in law • • • (he may) select her associates, separate her from her relatives, restrain her religious and personal freedom, compel her to cohabit with him, correct her faults by mild means, and, if necessary, chastise her with moderation, as though she were his apprentice or child.

This was the law in 1820.

In 1820 girls were not admitted to the public schools. Colleges did not admit them. Women were not permitted to speak in public. Few occupations were open to them.

Men were still quoting Voltaire, Lessing, Rousseau, and St. Chrysostom on the place of women in society. Voltaire had said:

> The woman who thinks is like a man who puts on rouge—ridiculous.

Lessing had declared:

> Ideas are like beards; women and young men have none.

Rousseau had written that it was the duty of women to make the lives of men agreeable. All their education and training should be to that end.

And St. Chrysostom, one of the great church fathers, had described women as—

> A necessary evil, a natural temptation, a desirable calamity, a domestic peril, a deadly fascination, and a painted ill.

Miss Anthony did not agree with these eminent men. She began a crusade for equal rights of women. At first she faced the almost solid opposition of the male population of the country and, strangely enough, the opposition of most of the slavery prohibitionists of the day. Also, she was opposed by most of the Negro men who had been freed as a result of the Civil War. Even a large part of the women of the country were opposed to suffrage.

It is not necessary to review the life and work of Susan B. Anthony. She met the usual fate of those who have fought for freedom of any part of humanity. She was insulted, abused, villified, mobbed, arrested, tried, convicted, and fined. Incidentally she never paid the fine. In 1861 in Syracuse, N. Y.—to use her own words—

> Rotten eggs were thrown, benches broken, and knives and pistols gleamed in every direction.

At one time she was campaigning over in South Dakota and a cyclone was approaching. Her friends entreated her to hurry to the cellar. She replied:

> Never mind. After my recent experiences, a little thing like a cyclone doesn't frighten me.

It seems now a far cry to those days. At the time of her death in 1906 there were some 77,000 women physicians, about 3,000 ordained ministers, and over 1,000 lawyers in the country. More than 3,000 occupations were then open to women. By 1914, 11 States had been granted woman suffrage, and in 1920 the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was ratified. Even before that amendment was adopted, 26 other countries had given women the right to vote.

On the day of her death thousands of tributes were paid her. She was called the greatest women this country has ever produced, and was compared with Washington and Lincoln.

Her life is a story of a great person, but it is more than that. It is the story of a great idea. Victor Hugo once said:

> There is one thing stronger than armies: and that is an idea when its time has come.

There are only a few people who are willing to pay the price of pursuing the cause of humanity to the end. It is too hard; derision is too galling; one gets too tired. But let us be thankful for the few, as Edwin Markham says, who will—

> In spite of the stare of the wise
> And the world's derision,
> Dare follow the star-blazed path,
> Dare follow the vision.

This is why we pause today to honor the memory of a very great woman—

> Who for love of the many dared stand with the few.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—AUTHORITY TO REPORT BILL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to propose a unanimous-consent request, but I wish to make a brief statement before I present the request.

It had been contemplated that the Committee on Appropriations would meet at 10:30 o'clock this morning to consider the report on the independent offices appropriation bill, so that the report might be submitted and printed today, and the bill be available for consideration tomorrow. By reason of some mistake the committee did not meet at 10:30, but will meet at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may be authorized to submit its report on the independent offices appropriation bill during the recess or adjournment of the Senate to follow this session, in order that the bill and the report may be printed this afternoon, and be available tomorrow, just as if the report had been filed in open Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the request of the Senator from Kentucky should be granted, no opportunity would be given to Senators to read the report or study the provisions of the bill as reported prior to the time when it would be brought up on the floor of the Senate for consideration. Such practice is not fair to those not members of the committee. The bill could be brought immediately before the Senate when it meets tomorrow, with no opportunity afforded Senators to study the report or the bill as reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The effect would be the same as if the bill were reported now because, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the bill and report would be printed just as soon as if the report were filed in open Senate. I appreciate the point made by the Senator that the bill should not be taken up until Senators have a chance to study it.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator's request does not conform with the practice which has been followed in the printing of reports. If I should consent to the proposal, it is not likely the report of the bill would be printed and made available before tomorrow. I shall object.

I may suggest that there is a way out of the difficulty. I recognize the fact that there is not much business on the calendar of the Senate. If the Senator will request that the committee may be permitted to report today and that the report and the bill be printed, and that then the Senate take a recess until Wednesday, giving ample opportunity for Senators to consider the bill and the report, I shall consent. Otherwise I shall object to the proposal made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have already conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and I was about to say to the Senator from Oregon that if he would not object to the request we would not take the bill up tomorrow, but would take it up Wednesday.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, that is an entirely different proposition. I will consent that the bill may be reported today and the report printed along with the bill, if the bill is not to be taken up for consideration until Wednesday at 12 o'clock. I would consent to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is entirely satisfactory, and I amend my request. I ask that the report may be filed during the recess or adjournment of the Senate to follow this session, with the understanding that the bill will not be considered before Wednesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment, by transfer, and also for promotion in the Regular Army.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of Capt. (Engineering) John I. Bryan to be commodore, on the retired list, in the Coast Guard of the United States, to rank as such from January 1, 1936.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the following nominations:

Lt. Col. Charles D. Barrett to be a colonel in the Marine Corps from the 1st day of February 1937;

Maj. Walter T. H. Galliford to be a lieutenant colonel in the Marine Corps from the 1st day of February 1937; and Capt. Otto E. Bartoe to be a major in the Marine Corps from the 1st day of February 1937.

Mr. WALSH also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers and persons for appointment as officers in the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be received and placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the namination of Howard S. Reed, of Arizona, to be State director in Arizona.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS TO WEDNESDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Wednesday, February 17, 1937, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We are lingering and waiting for Thee, O Lord. "If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." Heavenly Father, may we rise through the ministration of Thy Holy Spirit and be lifted up above all littleness, all untruth, and our hearts purified from all guile. In the name of the Master and in the name of man may we be friends of God. May it be given to us to practice those virtues which make our homes, whether cottage or castle, the abodes of peace and happiness. Blessed Lord, let these days be dedicated without discord to the diffusion of knowledge, rectitude, and justice throughout our Land. Take unto Thyself our President, our Speaker, and the entire Congress. In the name of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 12, 1937, was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana relating to the President's message on reorganization.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on low-cost housing in Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and include therein excerpts from a speech I made last Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LUDLOW, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported a bill (H. R. 4720) (Rept. No. 256) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order on said bill.

SIXTH WORLD'S POULTRY CONGRESS, LEIPZIG, GERMANY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 98.

House Resolution 98

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to report to the House of Representatives as soon as possible the name of each person designated by him to represent the United States in an official capacity to attend the Sixth World's Poultry Congress at Leipzig, Germany; the purpose of such representation, and further to report the cost of their transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses, and the appropriation from which such expenses were paid and the authority therefor.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture be read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1937.

Hon. MARVIN JONES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. JONES: Reference is made to your letter of February 2 relative to certain information asked for in House Resolution 98 of the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress regarding the Sixth World's Poultry Congress held in Leipzig, Germany, last summer.

The Department is in a position to furnish on request all the information asked for in this resolution except certain items on the cost of transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses. Not all of the accounts of persons attending the Congress in an official capacity have been settled at this date.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 98) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information relative to the Sixth World's Poultry Congress held in Leipzig, Germany, in the summer of 1936, to the House of Representatives, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The Secretary of Agriculture advises, under date of February 4, 1937, that the Department is in a position to furnish on request all the information asked for in this resolution except certain items on the cost of transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses, as not all of the accounts of persons attending the Congress in an official capacity have been settled at this date.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Department has agreed to supply the information requested, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have filed several resolutions of various committees respecting expenditures. I want it fully understood that this is a general inquiry from various committees. I do not want it to appear that I personally was on the trail of anybody. There have been a great many visits to Europe costing a great deal of money and I am trying to find out their purpose. It is difficult to find out that purpose or the amount of money expended. While it is not the duty of the majority party to do that, I think that it ought to be grateful for someone in the minority party to get that information. I thank the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture for getting this information for me. The resolution is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman had a similar resolution before my committee. He was called home through the birth of a grandson, upon which I heartily congratulate the gentleman, and I asked the gentleman's office if he would like to appear before the committee. All the information he sought has been put into the record.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Agriculture is always glad to secure the information for the gentleman. I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON FORESTRY AT BUDAPEST, HUNGARY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 99, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to report to the House of Representatives as soon as possible the name of each person designated by him and any other persons to attend the Second International Congress on Forestry at Budapest, Hungary, for the purpose of studying European forestry, and further to report the cost of their transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses, and the appropriation from which such expenses were paid and the authority therefor.

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 99) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information relative to the Second International Congress on Forestry at Budapest, Hungary, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The information asked for in this resolution has been made available in a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, under date of February 8, 1937, to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a communication from the Department of Agriculture respecting this resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1937.

CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. JONES: Reference is made to your letter of February 2, transmitting House Resolution No. 99, dated February 1, directing a report to the House of Representatives showing the names of persons attending the Second International Congress on Forestry at Budapest, Hungary, and the cost incident to such attendance.

Following is a statement of the members of the Department attending the convention and the expenses thereof charged to Government funds, appropriation "Salaries and expenses, Forest Service, 1937":

	Transportation	Per diem
F. A. Silcox, Chief, Forest Service		$52.50
C. E. Rachford, Assistant Chief, Forest Service	$15.00	61.50
Raphael Zon, director, Lake States Experiment Station	7.26	34.50

The transportation cost and subsistence of Messrs. Silcox and Rachford to and from Europe were not charged to Government funds, but these men were authorized, while in Europe, to perform some travel for official purposes and at Government expense. The expense to the Government of attending the Congress was confined to per diem during the period of attendance and, in the case of Mr. Rachford, a small cost of transportation from Budapest to Vienna following the Congress. Mr. Zon was on a trip to European countries and the British Isles primarily for the purpose of studying organization and technique in forest research and the cost to the Government of his attendance at the Congress was possible at the relatively small expense incident to his 4-day attendance, including travel time from Lillafured to Budapest and travel time and expense from Budapest to Vienna.

The act of June 26, 1912, requiring specific authorization for expenses of attendance at meetings or conventions by employees of the Government, was modified by act of March 4, 1913, to provide that it shall not be construed to prohibit payment from appropriations of the Department of Agriculture of expenses incident to delivery of lectures, giving of instruction, or acquiring information at meetings by Department employees on work of the Department authorized by law (T. 5, sec. 83, U. S. C.). Since the International Congress on Forestry afforded a means of acquiring information concerning foreign practices which might be applicable to the conduct of various phases of forestry practice in the United States, the above-cited act is understood to authorize payment of expenses incident to attendance at the Congress.

Sincerely,

W. R. GREGG, Acting Secretary.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COOPERATIVE ENTERPRISE IN EUROPE

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up a similar privileged resolution (H. Res. 101), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives as soon as possible the names of those persons designated by him and any others representing the United States in an official capacity to inquire into cooperative enterprise in Europe and to make a study and report upon the nature, ways of operation, and place in the economic structure of consumer's cooperation in European countries, and further to report to the House the cost of their transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses, and the appropriation from which such expenses were paid and the authority therefor.

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 101) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information relative to special inquiry on cooperative enterprises in Europe, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The information asked for in this resolution has been made available in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, under date of February 5, 1937, to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter which discloses the facts called for in the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1937.

HON. MARVIN JONES,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. JONES: Pursuant to your request, there is submitted herewith information concerning the special inquiry on cooperative enterprises in Europe for your consideration in connection with House Resolution No. 101.

This inquiry was led by Mr. Jacob Baker, Assistant Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, and was financed by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation with the approval of the President.

In order that the viewpoint of agricultural cooperatives might be adequately represented in connection with this study of European cooperative enterprises, Mr. Clifford Gregory and Mr. Robin Hood participated in the inquiry at my suggestion. Other members accompanying Mr. Baker were Miss Emily C. Bates, Mr. E. Johnston Coil, Mr. Tage Palm, Mr. Leland Olds, and Mr. Charles E. Stuart.

The cost of transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses of those engaged in the inquiry cannot be finally determined at the present time since the claims of the participants for reimbursement have all been submitted to the General Accounting Office for preaudit and are not yet paid. These claims amount to $8,152.35 for transportation, $4,491 for subsistence, $809.67 for incidental expenses, and $2,181.96 for losses sustained due to unfavorable rates of exchange, or a total of $15,634.98.

It is believed that this is the information requested, and I shall be glad to secure for you any further available information that may be required.

Very truly yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, if I understood this correctly this is where the Secretary of Agriculture is sending somebody abroad?

Mr. CONNERY. No; this furnishes the expenses of somebody who went abroad. The letter discloses the amount of the expenses and the appropriation from which they were paid.

Mr. RICH. I hope we are not going to put into effect here in America every agricultural scheme that has been tried in Europe.

Mr. JONES. This has nothing to do with that. It is a resolution purely of inquiry.

Mr. RICH. It seems to me that we are trying to pattern ourselves after these things which occur in Europe.

Mr. JONES. If the time ever comes when what the gentleman is saying is applicable to what is before the House, I shall recommend favorable consideration of his words.

Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE, ROME, ITALY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up a similar privileged resolution, House Resolution 102, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, together with the adverse report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to report to the House of Representatives as soon as possible the name of each person designated to represent the United States in an official capacity at the biennial assembly in 1936 of the International Institute of Agriculture in Rome, Italy; the purpose of such representation; and further to report the cost of their transportation, housing, subsistence, and incidental expenses, and the appropriation from which such expenses were paid and the authority therefor.

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 102) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information relative to the Biennial Assembly of International Institute of Agriculture in Rome, Italy, in 1936, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The Secretary of Agriculture, advises, under date of February 4, 1937, that the information requested in this resolution, in respect to the expenses incurred by members of that Department who attended the General Assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome in October 1936, is available and could be readily supplied. The Secretary points out, however, that the delegates of the United States to the General Assemblies of the International Institute of Agriculture are designated by the Secretary of State with the approval of the President.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture in reference to this resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, February 4, 1937.

HON. MARVIN JONES,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. JONES: Reference is made to your letter of February 2, with regard to House Resolution 102.

The information requested in this resolution, in respect to the expenses incurred by members of this Department who attended the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome in October 1936, is available and could be readily supplied in the event the resolution is adopted.

For the information of your committee it might be pointed out that the delegates of the United States to the general assemblies of the International Institute of Agriculture are designated by the Secretary of State with the approval of the President.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by the Attorney General of the United States yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The question of the gentleman, so far as the letter is concerned, has already been granted.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech over the radio delivered by Mr. CONNERY in New York City Saturday, February 13, 1937.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a brief tribute to Vice President and Mrs. Garner by Hon. Pat M. Neff, the president of Baylor University, of Waco, Tex., in connection with the address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] at the time honorary degrees were conferred upon Vice President Garner and Mrs. Garner by that university.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STRIKEBREAKERS AT FLINT, MICH.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution, House Resolution 112, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the House of Representatives all facts which he may possess, or which may be available in the Labor Department and which will show or tend to show—

(a) The number of strikebreakers, nonresidents of Flint, who have been brought into, or who are now in, that city, for the purpose of either (1) breaking up picket lines; or (2) ejecting sit-down strikers, from Fisher Body plant no. 1, Fisher Body plant no. 2, Chevrolet plant no. 4, or any other industrial plant in said city.

(b) That General Motors corporation, or any other corporation, firm, or individual, has, directly or indirectly, employed, brought into or caused to come to Flint, any person or persons for the purpose of (1) ousting sit-down strikers from its property; or (2) breaking up picket lines; or (3) by show of force or violence preventing any person from picketing or soliciting membership in any union.

(c) If information is furnished showing that any nonresidents of Michigan, or any person or persons who reside in Michigan outside the city of Flint, other than members of the National Guard or regularly appointed peace officers, have been brought, or have come, into Flint for the purpose of evicting sit-down strikers who have held possession of General Motors Corporation property, or breaking up picket lines, then, in addition, facts showing the sources from which any such person or persons have derived any compensation received by them.

(d) The total number of "company" guards or "company" police employed or on duty in Fisher Body Co. plant no. 1, Fisher Body Co. plant no. 2, and Chevrolet plant no. 4 prior to the time the same were occupied by the sit-down strikers.

(e) Like information as to the number at the present time now on duty in, or employed in guarding, said three plants.

(f) The number of such "company" guards or "company" police who are (1) residents of the city of Flint, Mich.; (2) nonresidents of said city; (3) residents of the State of Michigan; (4) nonresidents of said State.

(g) In what manner such "company" guards or police are armed.

(h) A recapitulation of the vote cast at the last election held under the auspices of, or supervised by, the Automobile Labor Board, appointed by the President of the United States, in the motor industry in Michigan, showing the number of votes cast by members of the union, the number belonging to each union, the number of votes cast by nonunion employees, each proposition voted upon, and the number for and against each proposition.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee be inserted at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Committee on Labor, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 112) requesting the Secretary of Labor to furnish the House of Representatives with certain information in regard to the current automobile-industry strike, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman have the letter from the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. CONNERY. No. This resolution called upon the employers to show how many strikebreakers were brought in, how many people were brought in to eject the sit-down strikers, and similar requests.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If any.

Mr. CONNERY. The committee felt this was just as partisan against the employers as the other resolution was against the laborers. The committee felt that in order to be fair in the matter it should report this adversely, just as it reported the other adversely.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If I combine the two, will there be any objection?

Mr. CONNERY. With the automobile strike settled, personally I can see no good reason for getting this information.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The strike, as I understand it, has been transferred to Anderson.

Mr. CONNERY. That is in Indiana. The gentleman is from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes. Of course, I have an interest in the country as a whole. [Laughter.] I want to ask this, if I may. The other day, if I recall, the Secretary said she did not have the information. I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts could ask the Secretary to refer to her file and get the report of John Porter, the representative she sent down there to Anderson, who did have some of the information that I asked for?

Mr. CONNERY. I am sure I shall be glad to act as intermediary for the gentleman with the Secretary, and I am sure that any information she has down there she will be glad to furnish.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The name of the agent is John Porter.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman [Mr. CONNERY].

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this being the thirty-ninth anniversary of the blowing up of the battleship Maine, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a short quotation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDING IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1937

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 26, to amend section 23 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 874), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 102).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I should like to have a word of explanation from the chairman of the Committee on Immigration or somebody who is interested in the bill.

Inasmuch as there appears to be no one here in behalf of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I object to its present consideration.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman object to having it passed over without prejudice?

Mr. McLEAN. No.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not hear the bill reported. Is it H. R. 26?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. TARVER. On last consent day this bill was passed over without prejudice. Since that time I have had some occasion to investigate its provisions, and I feel that I am definitely opposed to it. I know of no reason why it should be passed over without prejudice again.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I only made that request because I did not see the author of the bill or the chairman of the Committee on Immigration on the floor.

Mr. TARVER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TO DEPORT CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 28, to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that there is no one here to explain the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY STAY OF CERTAIN ALIENS IN THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 27, to authorize the shortening or termination of temporary stay in the United States of certain aliens not admitted for permanent residence, to authorize the deportation of certain aliens admitted for permanent residence, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE EMPLOYEES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1543, to amend section 24 of the Immigration Act of 1917, relating to the compensation of certain Immigration and Naturalization Service employees, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 24 of the Immigration Act of 1917 (39 Stat. 893), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 109), is amended by adding at the end thereof new paragraphs as follows:

"Immigration and Naturalization Service employees of the following classifications shall be divided into grades, as follows:

"Senior border patrol inspectors: Grade 1, salary $2,400; grade 2, salary $2,500; grade 3, salary $2,600.

"Border patrol inspectors: Grade 1, salary $2,100; grade 2, salary $2,200; grade 3, salary $2,300.

"Charwomen: Grade 1, salary $1,260; grade 2, salary $1,320; grade 3, salary $1,380.

"Messenger-clerks: Grade 1, salary $1,260; grade 2, salary $1,320; grade 3, salary $1,380.

"Messengers and assistant messengers: Grade 1, salary $1,080; grade 2, salary $1,140; grade 3, salary $1,200.

"On the first of the month next following the date of the approval of this act all employees of the above classifications shall be promoted to appropriate salary grades as hereinabove authorized. Thereafter each such employee shall be promoted successively to the next higher salary grade at the beginning of the next quarter following 1 year's satisfactory service (determined by standards of efficiency to be defined by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization with the approval of the Secretary of Labor) in the next lower grade, until the maximum salary grade of the particular classification shall have been reached.

"Promotions for meritorious service above the maximum rates specified herein may be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization.

"Administrative promotions for clerks above grade 5 shall be at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor and upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization to the following salary grades: $2,200, $2,300, $2,400, $2,500, and $2,600: Provided, That not to exceed 50 percent of the clerks in each of these administrative grades shall be promoted after no less than 1 year of meritorious service to the next higher administrative grade, until the maximum administrative grade for clerks herein provided has been reached.

"New appointments shall be made only at grade 1 of the appropriate classification, but an employee may be transferred from one classification to another without reduction in compensation, in the interest of good administration, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization with the approval of the Secretary of Labor.

"Nothing herein contained shall be construed to reduce the rate of salary of any person employed in the Immigration and Naturalization Service on the date of the approval of this act.

"The appropriation of such sums as may be necessary for the enforcement of this act is hereby authorized."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENTRY OF CERTAIN ALIEN WIVES OF AMERICAN CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3471, to permit alien wives of American citizens who were married prior to the approval of the Immigration Act of 1924 to enter the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

LABORERS IN POSTAL SERVICE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1609, to credit laborers in the Postal Service with any fractional part of a year's substitute service toward promotion.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Act No. 366, entitled "An act to provide time credits for substitute laborers in the post office when appointed as regular laborers", approved August 27, 1935 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. I, title 39, sec. 101), is amended to read as follows:

"That section 5 of the act entitled 'An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes', approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1060; U. S. C., title 39, sec. 101), is amended by adding thereto a new pagaraph to read as follows:

" 'Whenever any substitute laborer, watchman, or messenger is appointed to a permanent position as laborer, watchman, or messenger, the substitute service performed by such laborer, watchman, or messenger shall be computed in determining the eligibility of such person for promotion to grade 2 on the basis of 306 days of 8 hours constituting a year's service. Effective at the beginning of the first quarter following approval of this act, all laborers, watchmen, and messengers who have not progressed to grade 2 shall be promoted to that grade, provided they have the necessary credit of 306 days of 8 hours each constituting a year's service.

" 'Any fractional part of a year's substitute service will be included with service as a regular laborer, watchman, or messenger in the Postal Service in determining eligibility for promotion to the next higher grade following appointment to a regular position. Effective at once following approval of this act, all laborers, watchmen, and messengers who have not progressed to grade 2 shall be promoted to that grade, provided they have the necessary credit of 306 days of 8 hours each constituting a year's service.' "

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 10, at the end of the line, strike out "306 days" and insert "254 days" in lieu thereof.

Page 2, line 15 and 16, strike out "306 days" and insert "254 days" in lieu thereof.

Page 2, lines 24 and 25, strike out "306 days" and insert "254 days" in lieu thereof.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUPERINTENDENTS AT CLASSIFIED POST-OFFICE STATIONS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1972, giving superintendents at classified post-office stations credit for substitutes serving under them.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustments, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 93), is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: Provided, That in determining the number of employees at a classified station credit shall be allowed for service performed by regular employees, substitute employees, temporary employees, and special-delivery messengers assigned to the station, and for each 1,912 hours of service performed by such employees the station superintendent shall be allowed credit for one employee.

SEC. 2. The second proviso of the first paragraph of section 4, the sixth paragraph of section 7, and the eighth and eleventh paragraphs of section 11 of the act entitled "An act to reclassify the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended, are amended by striking out the words "306 days" wherever such words appear in such proviso and in each such paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "239 days."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, lines 18 and 19, strike out "239 days" and insert "254 days" in lieu thereof.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJUSTING SALARIES OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3610, to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 8 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following new sentence: "The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow and pay such additional compensation as he may determine to be fair and reasonable in each individual case to rural letter carriers serving heavily patronized routes not exceeding 38 miles in length: Provided, That in no case shall the total compensation of a rural letter carrier serving a heavily patronized route of 38 miles or less in length exceed $2,100 per annum, exclusive of maintenance allowance."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this act is enacted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROTECTING SALARIES OF CERTAIN RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3609, to protect the salaries of rural letter carriers who transfer from one rural route to another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is no report from the Department in the committee report. I understand that the Department does not believe that this bill should be made retroactive to 1934, as is provided in the bill. What is the purpose of making this bill retroactive to that date?

Mr. BURCH. In 1934 the method of paying rural-free-delivery carriers was changed. Up to that time it had been $1,800 per annum for 24 miles and $30 per mile for all over 24. Under the act of 1934 it was made $1,800 for 30 miles and $30 per mile over that. There was a saving clause in that legislation affecting carriers with routes under 30 miles in length.

Mr. COSTELLO. How many carriers will it affect?

Mr. BURCH. Not a great many. This change is necessitated by a ruling of the Comptroller putting a different interpretation on the $1,800 proviso of the 1934 bill than was intended by the committee. Under that ruling a man changed to a 24-mile route was reduced to $1,620 under the 1934 act, whereas before that he would have received $1,800; and in some instances under the 1934 act and the Comptroller's ruling he would get only $1,440.

Mr. COSTELLO. My reason for bringing the question up at the present time is that I understand the Department did not like to have this legislation made retroactive. That is the only reason upon which I am questioning the legislation at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF 40-HOUR LAW TO CERTAIN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2738, to extend the provisions of the 40-hour law for postal employees to watchmen and messengers in the Postal Service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act entitled "An act to fix the hours of duty of postal employees, and for other purposes", approved August 14, 1935, is amended by striking out the words "and laborers" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "laborers, watchmen, and messengers."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO PERSONS SERVING AS POSTMASTER AT THIRD- AND FOURTH-CLASS POST OFFICES

The Clerk call the next bill, H. R. 77, for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmasters at third- and fourth-class post offices.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have some one in charge of the bill explain it a little. If no one is present to do that, I object.

CLASSIFIED STATUS OF CERTAIN SPECIAL-DELIVERY MESSENGERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2006, to permit special-delivery messengers to acquire a classified status through noncompetitive examination.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF FEBRUARY 28, 1925, RELATIVE TO POSTAL RATES ON THIRD-CLASS MATTER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1521, to amend the act of February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1053), relative to postal rates on third-class mail matter.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 206 (a) of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended (43 Stat. 1053; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 235), is hereby amended by inserting before the period at the end of such section a comma and the following: "but bills or statements of account produced by any photographic or mechanical process shall not be accepted as mail matter of the third class unless presented in quantities of 20 or more identical copies. When such bills or statements are not identical or are presented in quantities of less than 20 identical copies, they shall be subject to postage at the first-class rate."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TIME CREDITS FOR SUBSTITUTES IN THE MOTOR-VEHICLE SERVICE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2021, to provide time credits for substitutes in the motor-vehicle service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last paragraph of section 11 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 39, sec. 104), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "Any fractional part of a year's substitute service, rendered after the enactment of this sentence, shall be included with his service as a regular clerk, garageman-driver, driver-mechanic, or general mechanic in the motor-vehicle service, in determining eligibility for promotion to the next higher grade following appointment to a regular position."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN FOR THE ACCOUNT OF N. J. MOOSA, A BRITISH SUBJECT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2909, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of N. J. Moosa, a British subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FADDIS and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs a question, but will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object then.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and voted for every one of these bills.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to make that type of speech I shall have to object.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman, Is he objecting to this bill on his own account or is he objecting at the request of some other person?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I inform the gentleman from Tennessee that I am going to either ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice, as well as the next 14, or object; not on my own account, but at the request of another Member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to give the Members a little information in reference to these bills. Every one of these bills passed this House by unanimous consent at the last session of the Congress. The gentleman from Massachusetts is making this objection, as he stated, at the request of another member of the committee, and that is the gentleman from New York, Mr. HAMILTON FISH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is peeved because no Republican was appointed or asked to go to the Buenos Aires convention. He has notified the committee he is going to object to every bill that is brought out by this committee for consideration by the Members of this House. I want the Members to know that the objection is lodged, not on account of the merits of the bill but on account of the fact perhaps the gentleman wants to be recognized himself. He stated before the committee the other day that he represented 18,000,000 Republicans of this country, and I told him I was glad to find the man who did represent those who were left.

Mr. Speaker, I merely want to explain that these bills were voted for by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], who is now objecting for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and that these bills were passed unanimously by the Members of the House at the last session. The reason for the objection is on account of pure partisanship, and I want the Members of the House to know this fact.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF NETHERLANDS ON ACCOUNT OF FAMILY OF MIGUEL PAULA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2910, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of the Netherlands for the account of the family of Miguel Paula.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object to any of these bills being passed over without prejudice. I want them to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT FOR THE ACCOUNT OF HENRY BORDAY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2911, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the French Government for the account of Henry Borday, a citizen of France.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN FOR THE ACCOUNT OF SHANGHAI ELECTRIC CONSTRUCTION CO., LTD.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2912, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ltd.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN FOR THE ACCOUNT OF CERTAIN BRITISH CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2925, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of certain British citizens.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JANET HARDCASTLE ROSS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2913, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Canada for the account of Janet Hardcastle Ross, a citizen of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

ENRIQUETA KOCH V. DE JEANNERET

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2914, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Chile for the account of Enriqueta Koch v. de Jeanneret, a citizen of Chile.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

LI PO-TIEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2915, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of Li Po-tien.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

CLAIM OF CERTAIN CHINESE CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2916, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

CLAIM OF CERTAIN CITIZENS OF CHINA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2918, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain citizens of China.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

CLAIM OF CERTAIN CHINESE CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2919, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

MERCEDES MARTINEZ VIUDA DE SANCHEZ

The clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2920, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of the Dominican Republic for the account of Mercedes Martinez Viuda de Sanchez, a Dominican subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

LING MAU MAU

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2921, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of Ling Mau Mau, a citizen of China.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

CLAIM OF CERTAIN CHINESE CITIZENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2922, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

MERCEDES V. DE WILLIAMS AND OTHERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2923, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Nicaragua for the account of Mercedes V. de Williams and others.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs a question.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. I should like to know with respect to these bills by which it seems we owe money to a subject of a foreign nation which owes us war debts, why it is not possible to arrange for such nations to pay the claim and receive credit on its war debts.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. In nearly all of these cases the nation involved does not owe us anything.

Mr. FADDIS. But in some instances they do. Three of them are for subjects of Great Britain and one is for a subject of France. These nations owe us war debts in staggering amounts and are making no effort to pay them.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They are claims of individuals and not national claims.

Mr. FADDIS. But the nation involved could pay the claims to their citizens and receive credit from the United States on its war debt.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. These claims do not represent what we owe the Government but what we owe the individuals, and there is no reason why we should not pay their individuals something that we owe them. We certainly should not refuse to do so on the ground they will not pay us something that they owe us as a government or as a nation.

Mr. FADDIS. I realize that fact; but if these nations believe their subjects are entitled to a claim, they can pay it and we can give them credit on the war debts.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. One of the British claims is for $15.95, which would not go very far on the war debt.

Mr. FADDIS. Yes; and some are for much larger sums. Every year bills of this nature pass this House involving the payment of thousands of dollars to citizens of governments which owe this Nation millions of dollars which they are making no attempt to pay. If we exert the proper pressure—and we can do so by objecting to these bills—their State Departments and the State Department of the United States can adjust the matters by a little bookkeeping. There is no reason why we should take money from our Treasury to adjust such matters. These claims, it is true, are due to individuals, but nations are composed of individuals. Let us awaken these individuals to the fact that their nations owe us money. In that case perhaps they will exert pressure on their governments to settle with us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUTING OF ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill on the calendar, H. R. 3679, to restrict habitual commuting of aliens from foreign contiguous territory to engage in skilled or unskilled labor or employment in continental United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no alien or aliens, foreigner or foreigners, or citizens of any foreign country, nation, or colony, or a citizen of a possession of any foreign nation or country, the boundaries of which touch the boundaries of the United States of America or are contiguous thereto, shall be permitted to habitually cross said international boundary line for the purpose of seeking employment or engaging in any employment, vocation, or trade, either as skilled or unskilled labor employment, in the United States of America to and from his or their residence or residences which are outside of the borders of the said continental United States.

SEC. 2. The words "alien", "foreigner", and "citizen of any foreign country, nation, or colony" shall be construed to mean any person who has his residence in said foreign country, nation or possession or colony of a foreign country.

SEC. 3. Aliens within the purview of sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be held to be immigrants and shall be excluded from the United States, or shall be deported from the United States under the provisions of the immigration laws now in effect, unless they are in possession of an unexpired immigration visa at each separate application for admission or in possession of an unexpired reentry permit for each separate application to return from foreign contiguous territory.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all of the penal or other provisions of such laws now applicable shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. The provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any person who is a bona-fide employee of any common carrier operating between the United States and any foreign contiguous territory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, I am fully in accord with the purpose of the bill but I was wondering if the purpose is not negatived by the fact that there is nothing in the bill to prevent the State Department from issuing a visa to reenter.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the bill passed the House at the last session by unanimous consent. This bill is designed solely to create jobs for Americans who live in the United States. It seems that by the figures given the Immigration Committee that there are between 30,000 and 45,000 people along the border who cross over daily from Canada into the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the gentleman got the figures of those who cross from this country into Canada?

Mr. SCHULTE. Less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I was wondering if it could not be prevented by the refusal of a visa to reenter.

Mr. SCHULTE. I want to say to the gentleman that we are not going to get any cooperation from the State Department.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think it better be recommitted to the committee and let the committee see if there are some objections that do not occur to me. The bill is all right, but I do not think it goes far enough. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. SCHULTE. If the gentleman will withhold his objection we will try to get it through the Senate.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SCHULTE. I object to that. The gentleman from California does not want to keep American citizens out of a job. There are, as I say, 30,000 to 45,000 coming over from Canada into the United States.

Mr. COSTELLO. How many go over the border from this side into Canada?

Mr. SCHULTE. Less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

Mr. COSTELLO. The report of the Secretary of Labor shows that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, there was a total of 9,067 crossing from the United States into Canada.

Mr. SCHULTE. I do not agree with the figures of the Labor Department relative to any immigration bill.

Mr. COSTELLO. In the report at the bottom of page 3 it is stated that petitions are being circulated for signatures to the President asking for the issuance of an Executive order to stop commuting until an official investigation can be made.

Mr. SCHULTE. I will say that we have been trying to get an investigation. There have been 50,000 crossed over the Mexican border into the United States. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill at this time.

GRAND JURY EXTENSIONS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2702) to permit grand jury extensions to be ordered by any district judge.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 284 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 421), be, and the same is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 284. No grand jury shall be summoned to attend any district court unless the judge thereof, in his own discretion or upon a notification by the district attorney that such jury will be needed, orders a venire to issue therefor. If the United States attorney for any district which has a city or borough containing at least 300,000 inhabitants shall certify in writing to a district judge of the district that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may, in his discretion, also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury. If the United States attorney for the southern district of New York shall certify in writing to the senior district judge of said district that the exigencies of the public service require it, said judge may, in his discretion, also order a venire to issue for a third grand jury. The district court may in term order a grand jury to be summoned at such time, and to serve such time as it may direct, whenever, in its judgment, it may be proper to do so. A district judge may, upon a request of the district attorney or of the grand jury or on his own motion, by order authorize any grand jury to continue to sit during the term succeeding the term at which such request is made, solely to finish investigations begun but not finished by such grand jury, but no grand jury shall be permitted to sit in all during more than three terms. Nothing herein shall operate to extend beyond the time permitted by law the imprisonment before indictment found of a person accused of crime or offense, or the time during which a person so accused may be held under recognizance before indictment found."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2703) to provide for the representation of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on the annual conference of senior circuit judges.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 2 of the act entitled "An act for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the fourth judicial circuit, for the appointment of additional district judges for certain districts, providing for an annual conference of certain judges, and for other purposes", approved September 14, 1922 (42 Stat. 838; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 218), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Chief Justice of the United States, or in case of his disability, of one of the other Justices of the Supreme Court, in order of their seniority, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and annually thereafter, to summon to a conference on the last Monday in September, at Washington, D. C., or at such other time and place in the United States as the Chief Justice, or, in case of his disability, any of said Justices in order of their seniority, may designate the senior circuit judge of each judicial circuit and the chief justice of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. If any senior circuit judge is unable to attend, the Chief Justice, or in case of his disability, the Justice of the Supreme Court calling said conference, may summon any other circuit or district judge in the judicial circuit whose senior circuit judge is unable to attend, and, if the chief justice of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia is unable to attend, any other justice of that court may be summoned in like manner, that each circuit may be adequately represented at said conference. It shall be the duty of every judge or justice thus summoned to attend said conference, and to remain throughout its proceedings, unless excused by the Chief Justice, and to advise as to the needs of his circuit and as to any matters in respect of which the administration of justice in the courts of the United States may be improved."

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COSTELLO: Page 2, line 7, insert a comma after the word "designate."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MANNER OF INFLICTING DEATH PUNISHMENT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2705) to provide for the manner of inflicting the punishment of death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to have someone explain what the bill does.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, the bill provides that where a judgment of the United States court inflicts the death penalty, the penalty shall be carried out in the manner provided by the laws of the State in which the case is tried; and in some States in which there is no death penalty, the penalty shall be carried out according to the laws of the nearest State having the death penalty. It simply takes care of these kidnaping cases and cases of that character where there is a question of how the death penalty shall be carried out. The Federal law now provides only for hanging, and this bill will permit the use of more humane methods where the States have provided them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 323 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 542) be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 323. The manner of inflicting the punishment of death shall be the manner prescribed by the laws of the State within which the sentence is imposed. The United States marshal charged with the execution of the sentence may use available State or local facilities and the services of an appropriate State or local official or employ some other person for such purpose, and pay the cost thereof in an amount approved by the Attorney General. If the laws of the State within which sentence is imposed make no provision for the infliction of the penalty of death, then the court shall designate some other State in which such sentence shall be executed in the manner prescribed by the laws thereof."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAYMENT TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES FOR MILEAGE TRAVELED IN PRIVATELY OWNED AUTOMOBILES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3425) providing payment to employees, Bureau of Reclamation, for mileage traveled in privately owned automobiles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. How much is involved in this bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, we received a report upon a similar bill to this last year which I have before me. The practice in the Irrigation and Reclamation Service was to allow employees going from headquarters to a project money for gasoline consumed on the journey. The Comptroller General finally disapproved and the practice was stopped from that time on. The bill provides an allowance for those employees who have paid out money for gasoline up to the time the Comptroller General disallowed the practice.

Mr. TABER. How much is involved?

Mr. DEMPSEY. A very small amount. I do not think more than a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, all told, but to the various employees it means considerable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to credit disbursing agents of the Bureau of Reclamation for payments made as mileage reimbursement for the use, during the period of February 14, 1931, to April 30, 1932, of privately owned motor vehicles, in accordance with the act of February 14, 1931 (46 Stat. 1146), which payments were suspended and/or disallowed pursuant to the decision of the Comptroller General of April 30, 1932 (A-41688). In those cases where collections have been made from employees pursuant to such suspensions and/or disallowances refunds are authorized.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

COMPENSATION TO PERSONS SERVING AS POSTMASTERS, ETC.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 12 (H. R. 77), for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmaster at third- and fourth-class post offices. These seems to have been some misapprehension as to whether this was objected to or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to H. R. 77, Calendar No. 12. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. It is unusual that we do not object to returning to a bill, but as I understand in this case the Journal shows that I objected to the bill. I have a distinct recollection that I did not object, because I was very much in favor of it. I have no objection to returning to the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the Journal shows that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] objected to the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman insist upon his objection?

Mr. TABER. I reserve my right to object to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, we will return to H. R. 77, Calendar No. 12, and the gentleman from New York reserves his right to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I wish someone would explain the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, from 1930 to 1935 there was no law authorizing the payment of those persons discharging the duties of postmaster pending the appointment of acting postmasters following the death, resignation, or removal of the permanent postmaster. In such contingencies some one had to take charge until an acting postmaster could be secured, and there was no provision for paying them.

The Department agreed they were entitled to pay for their services, but the General Accounting Office held there was no authorization of law. Two years ago this matter was remedied by legislation, and such services are now compensable. There is now authorization for paying them as such emergencies occur, but through some oversight no provision was made for the payment of those who served between 1930 and 1935. It was not retroactive. There is hardly a congressional district in the United States in which some person is not waiting payment for such services. The Post Office Department says they should be paid, but there is no authority for making payment. This bill passed the House last session and went to the Senate, but it reached there too late for the Senate to act upon it.

The authorization provided by this bill is greatly needed, and I trust the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. Is it not a fact that every time a case like this occurs we have to pass a special act or a special resolution in order to pay the man?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman is correct. There is no other means of discharging these obligations, and the passage of this general act will not only permit the payment of these debts, long overdue, but will relieve the Congress of the consideration of such bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States, in the settlement and adjustment of accounts and claims for services rendered at third- and fourth-class post offices, is hereby authorized and directed to allow compensation as postmaster to persons who, upon the occurrence of a vacancy and pending the designation of an acting postmaster, assumed and properly performed the duties of postmaster at any such office subsequent to June 30, 1930: Provided, That in no case shall compensation be allowed for a period in excess of 60 days.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CLAIM OF GEN. HIGINIO ALVAREZ

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2917, authorizing an appropriation for the payment of the claim of Gen. Higinio Alvarez, a Mexican citizen, with respect to lands on the Farmers Banco in the State of Arizona.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was on the Consent Calendar last year. I notice that when it is presented this year the objection which was made at that time has not been considered. Apparently the Committee on Foreign Affairs paid little attention to the fact that there was a grave question as to whether a quitclaim deed from an individual would convey to the United States sovereignty over this land. That question arose last year and it arose in this manner: If this land had always belonged to the United States and this commission decided that it did belong to the United States, then there was no compensation due to this Mexican individual by reason of the fact that it was United States territory, and we do not owe him anything for the land. If it was Mexican territory and by agreement between this commission, this land was given the United States, a quitclaim deed from a Mexican national will not give the United States Government jurisdiction over the sovereignty. The question comes up this year as it did last year, and I wonder why the committee did not take that into consideration when they were considering the bill?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, replying to the gentleman from Michigan, I thought I had convinced the gentleman that that misunderstanding had been wiped out in accordance with a letter which I showed the gentleman from the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Carr. The report shows that the thought of the gentleman is entirely disproved, and by paying $15,000 to the owner of the land and $5,000 to the person who has a right in the land, the Government of the United States is satisfied that it will have a proper deed to the property. That is all contained in this report.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I read with a great deal of interest the letter which the gentleman submitted to me last year. Perhaps it is just a matter of a difference of opinion between myself and the author of that opinion, but it seems to me that a grave question might arise in this case. Assuming there is a violation of a Federal statute on this piece of land and it was to be tested in the courts as to the jurisdiction of the Federal court over the subject matter of the suit. If the court in a judicial opinion held that this land had never legally been conveyed to the United States Government, then the Federal court would have no jurisdiction over the subject matter of that suit. That is why I am so insistent that the gentleman know where he is going before he goes any farther.

Mr. BLOOM. I know where I am going. I am going right into an objection by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]. So what is the use talking about it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts is going to ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. And the gentleman from New York is going to object.

Mr. SNELL. How does the gentleman know until I ask the question?

Mr. BLOOM. No. I mean that the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLOOM, is going to object to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Let me read this from the report:

> This question of sovereignty was definitely determined by the decision of the International Boundary Commission, acting pursuant to the treaties in force between the United States and Mexico, eliminating this banco to the United States. There remained only the question of private title. In order to clear up this question of title it was suggested that this Government purchase the interest claimed by General Alvarez.

That answers the gentleman fully with respect to the title. The State Department went into it thoroughly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Tell me why the United States Government wants title to this land any more than it wants to buy my house in Michigan?

Mr. BLOOM. They want title to it because it is on the riverbed, and they think they should have it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Why should we buy this land from this Mexican citizen if it is already United States territory?

Mr. BLOOM. We are buying it for the reason that the gentleman has complained about, that is, to get clear title. We are paying this $20,000, and the United States thinks it should pay this to get a clear title to this land.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman does not answer the question. Why does the United States want title to this private property any more than it wants title to his house or my house?

Mr. BLOOM. The complete answer is in the report.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES FOR JANUARY 20, 1937

The Clerk called the next resolution, House Joint Resolution 131, for the payment of certain employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and employees of the District of Columbia for January 20, 1937.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and the employees of the District of Columbia who come within the provisions of the act approved June 18, 1888, and who, under the provisions of said act, did not work on Wednesday, January 20, 1937, due to the closing of their places of employment on account of the holiday, shall be entitled to pay for said holiday.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, BROWNVILLE, NEBR.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 194, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Brownville, Nebr.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Brownville, Nebr., authorized to be built by the county of Atchison, State of Missouri, and the county of Nemaha, State of Nebraska, singly or jointly, by section 18 of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1935, heretofore extended by act of Congress approved June 19, 1936, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.
> SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

> In line 10, after the word "from", strike out the words "the date of approval hereof" and in lieu thereof substitute the words "June 19, 1937."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, EAGLE ROCK, MO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2258, granting the consent of Congress to the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the White River at or near Eagle Rock, Mo.

By unanimous consent, Senate bill 466 was substituted for the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senate bill identical with the House bill?

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill is identical with the House bill, and passed by the Senate last week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the White River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Eagle Rock, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.
> SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 2258) were laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PORTION OF DELAWARE RIVER, CAMDEN, N. J.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2306, to authorize the Crew Levick Co. and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden and the State of New Jersey and Petty Island in said county and State.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Crew Levick Co., a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, and such other corporation or individuals, if any, as shall be associated with said company for the purpose, their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the intervening portion of the Delaware River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from the mainland of Camden County, in the State of New Jersey, to Petty Island, in said county and State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and that said bridge may be for private highway purposes.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS COLUMBIA RIVER NEAR THE DALLES, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2503, to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near The Dalles, Oreg.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near The Dalles, Oreg., authorized to be built by The Dalles Bridge Co., a Washington corporation, by an act of Congress approved March 4, 1933, is hereby extended 3 years from March 4, 1937, to March 4, 1940.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 7, following the comma after the date "1933", insert the words "heretofore extended by act of Congress approved April 30, 1934,".

In line 7, after the word "hereby", insert the word "further."

In line 7, after the date "1937", change the comma to a period and strike out the words "to March 4, 1940."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendments. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time merely to compliment the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the form of the bill H. R. 2306, in which I notice they have deviated somewhat from their usual form. It has always been my contention that the Congress of the United States had jurisdiction over bridges across navigable streams only so far as that bridge might be an impediment to traffic, and that the Congress of the United States had no jurisdiction whatsoever over the manner in which the bridge was to be financed or bonds for the financing of the bridge retired. I notice that the committee have established a new precedent in this respect. I am glad they have, and I hope it will be followed in future bridge bills.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I may say to the gentleman that the bridge in this case connects the mainland with an island in the Delaware River. The sole purpose for which the bridge is supposed to be used is for the travel of employees of the company back and forth from their homes on the mainland to the plant on the island. It will be used for no public highway purpose whatsoever.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Perhaps I was in error in my statement that the committee had established a precedent.

Mr. CHAPMAN. It is a privately owned bridge to be used for private purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS COOSA RIVER, GILBERTS FERRY, ALA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3148, granting the consent of Congress to the State of Alabama, or Etowah County, or both, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Gilberts Ferry, in Etowah County, Alabama.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Alabama, or Etowah County, or both, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Coosa River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Gilberts Ferry, in Etowah County, Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TURTLE BAY AND TURTLE BAYOU, TEX.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3689, declaring Turtle Bay and Turtle Bayou, Chambers County, Tex., to be nonnavigable waterways.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Turtle Bay and Turtle Bayou, in Chambers County, in the State of Texas, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be nonnavigable waterways within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

After line 6, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the existing project for Turtle Bayou, Tex., authorized by the Rivers and Harbors Act approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, abandoned."

In line 7, change "Sec. 2" to read "Sec. 3."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE SKAGWAY RIVER, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1550, authorizing a preliminary examination of the Skagway River in the vicinity of Skagway, Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Skagway River in the vicinity of Skagway, Alaska, with a view to the control of floods in the said Skagway River, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

With the following committee amendments:

Insert the words "and survey" after the word "examination" in line 4.

Strike out the words "section 3 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes', approved March 1, 1917", in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936."

Strike out the words "examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors" in lines 11 and 12 and insert in lieu thereof the words "such purposes."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended to read: "A bill authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of the Skagway River in the vicinity of Skagway, Alaska."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE MACKINAW RIVER IN ILLINOIS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1629, to provide for a preliminary examination of the Mackinaw River in Illinois with a view to flood control and to determine the cost of such improvement.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination to be made of the Mackinaw River, in Illinois, to determine the feasibility of flood-control work on said river and the cost of such improvement, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the control of floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes", approved March 1, 1917, and the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "Illinois", strike out the remainder of the line, all of lines 6 and 7, and insert "with a view to control of its floods."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "of", strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 9 and 10 and line 1 on page 2 and insert "the Flood Control Act approved June 22, 1936."

Page 2, line 4, after the word "for", strike out the remainder of the line and all of line 5 and insert "such purposes."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to provide for a preliminary examination and survey of the Mackinaw River in Illinois with a view to flood control."

TRANSFER OF CRAWFORD COUNTY, IOWA, FROM THE SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF IOWA TO THE NORTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF IOWA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3284, to transfer Crawford County, Iowa, from the southern judicial district of Iowa to the northern judicial district of Iowa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That Crawford County, Iowa, of the western division of the southern judicial district of Iowa be, and it is hereby, detached from said judicial district and attached to the western division of the northern judicial district of Iowa.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 112 OF THE JUDICIAL CODE PROVIDING FOR THE INCLUSION OF WHITMAN COUNTY, WASH., IN THE NORTHERN DIVISION OF THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3411, to amend section 112 of the Judicial Code, to provide for the inclusion of Whitman County, Wash., in the northern division of the eastern district of Washington.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of section 112 of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 28, sec. 193) is amended to read as follows: "The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July 1910 in the counties of Spokane, Stevens, Ferry, Okanogan, Chelan, Grant, Douglas, Lincoln, Adams, and Whitman, with the waters thereof, including all Indian reservations within said counties, which shall constitute the northern division; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Asotin, Garfield, Columbia, Franklin, Walla Walla, Benton, Klickitat, Kittitas, and Yakima, with the waters thereof, including all Indian reservations within said counties, which shall constitute the southern division of said district."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A TERM OF THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES AT ORLANDO, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2905, to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.", approved June 15, 1933.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of this matter.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, in the law authorizing the holding of terms of court in Orlando, Fla., is a provision that the authority shall exist only so long as accommodations can be provided without expense to the United States. The Treasury Department contemplates the erection of a building at Orlando, and in view of the fact this building will in all probability be erected in the near future and provision will be made in it for all other Federal activities, the people of that community feel they ought not to be prevented because of existing law from having the opportunity to have a courtroom constructed in this building if and when it is constructed.

Mr. McLEAN. Is not this the bill that was passed last year with the distinct understanding the district would be established only provided it was without cost to the United States?

Mr. WALTER. That is correct. This is not one of the cases, however, where they come in one year and secure the authority to hold terms of court and subsequently seek an appropriation for a building in which to hold court. The Treasury Department is going to construct a Federal building, in all probability, in which there will be housed the post office and various other activities of the Federal Government. It is felt at the time the building is constructed provision should be made for the holding of court therein.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not like the atmosphere of passing a bill one year, then providing for certain expenses next year.

Mr. WALTER. I may say to the gentleman our committee did not like that feature either. As a matter of fact, there was some discussion concerning the motive back of this, but the members concluded unanimously that was not the case with this particular bill. Here is what will happen? In the event a Federal building is constructed and this prohibition is not removed from the existing law, it will be utterly impossible to ever be able to hold court in the Federal building unless, of course, there is a courthouse constructed for that purpose.

Mr. McLEAN. The enactment of this bill will be an authorization to spend a larger sum of money on the Federal building than is now contemplated?

Mr. WALTER. I believe that is the fact; yes.

Mr. GREEN. May I say this does not authorize that? It simply removes a restriction.

Mr. MICHENER. It means the addition of another story onto that building.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to explain this bill. I discussed this matter with Mr. Smith Purdum, of the Post Office Department, and Mr. Martin, of the Procurement Division, and it was their request that the act be amended. I did not know that this act existed until it was called to my attenion, and it is at their request that I introduced this measure.

The point is we are not asking for the courtrooms now, and we are going to stick to our agreement in Orlando. As long as we do not have a Federal building there it will not cost the Federal Government a cent. This situation has happened in other districts; for instance, in the district represented by Mr. WILCOX. They had a provision of this kind and then a Federal building was built in the town, and today, because the disability was not removed, they have a beautiful Federal building there and they are still holding Federal court in an old ramshackle building. That is what will happen in Orlando. We have a good-sized court for the Federal judge. He spends about 40 percent of his time in Orlando. We do not know whether we are going to have a Federal building this year, or next year, or when, but we do know the Department is contemplating building a new building, and when they do we would like to have them include a Federal court room. Therefore I was requested to offer this bill and that is the reason I am explaining it at this time.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. Is it not true there are other Federal agencies operating in Orlando, and if a post-office building is erected, it is planned to house those activities in the post-office building?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman is correct. The Internal Revenue Department and a number of other departments will have their offices in that building.

Mr. HEALEY. So another story would be necessary anyway?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is right. The other stories would be needed anyway.

Mr. McLEAN. How much will be the difference in cost between the building to be constructed——

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe Mr. Hobbs says $40,000 will represent the difference in cost.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACTS OF CONGRESS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2260, to provide for appearance on behalf of and appeal by the United States in certain cases in which the constitutionality of acts of Congress is involved.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it contemplated that this bill will be brought up under a rule or under suspension or in some other manner by which we may have an opportunity to discuss the bill and offer amendments?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; I feel this is too important a measure to be brought up on this calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is my objection.

Mr. WALTER. At some future date an attempt will be made to bring it up in another manner.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no objection to the bill going over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

APPROPRIATION FOR BOOKS FOR THE ADULT BLIND

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 168, to authorize an increase in the annual appropriation for books for the adult blind.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill increases the authorization $100,000, and it appears that in 2 years there are now 18,000 blind who are able to get books, whereas there were only 1,500 prior to that time.

It is perfectly apparent that with the present appropriation increased facilities can be given, and there is really no evidence whatever in the report that indicates there is any reason for any further appropriation. Under the circumstances, I am going to ask that the bill be passed over——

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his request a moment?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill. There was a very interesting hearing before the Library Committee on the subject of an additional appropriation on behalf of the blind. I think we should show a very charitable and friendly disposition toward the requests that these people make. This is a very reasonable and sensible proposition. The Librarian of Congress, Dr. Putnam, appeared before the Library Committee, as well as several representatives of the blind. I feel this is a very humane measure and one that we can very well accept and pass.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. May I say to the gentleman from New York, just as our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has said, this legislation is very humanitarian.

May I say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that at least 20 percent of those who have lost their sight are able to read with their fingers, which means that the other 80 percent are not able to read in this way, not because they do not possess sufficient intelligence but because they are unable to develop their touch. For example, many of the unfortunate men lost their sight in the mills, mines, and factories, and it is very difficult for these men to develop their touch or learn to read Braille. Therefore a bill of this kind will permit these unfortunate people to have an opportunity to have reading done in their own homes by having these books sent to them from the different libraries, and on behalf of the 100,000 blind in the country I would appreciate it if the gentleman would not object.

Mr. TABER. Let me propound this question: It appears there is now an appropriation authorized of a very considerable amount and that the number of people who are being served by these sound records has increased in 2 years from 1,500 to 18,000. It appears also, by necessary inference, that a continuance of the present appropriation will provide for a further substantial increase, and there is nothing whatever in the report to indicate that this would not be sufficient to take care of any reasonable demands.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman that in this instance I think the increase in the facilities is due to the activity of such clubs as the Lions. The Lions International has as its major activity the relief of the blind and the correction of defective vision. They have made it possible for those who were not financially able to buy these machines to acquire them. I understand it is their purpose to continue to increase the facilities for the use of these records constantly until every blind person in the United States is either taught to read the Braille system or is furnished with a recording instrument by which he may listen to these records. I think it is a most worthy undertaking; and I think, if we can afford, as I am sure the gentleman will agree we cannot afford, to spend $200,000,000 for the construction of roads in Virginia and North Carolina and Mississippi, we can surely afford to appropriate an additional $100,000 for this worthy purpose.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind", approved March 3, 1931 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 2, sec. 135a), is amended to read as follows:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually to the Library of Congress, in addition to appropriations otherwise made to said Library, the sum of $275,000, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Librarian of Congress to provide books published either in raised characters, on sound-reproduction records, or in any other form, for the use of the adult blind residents of the United States, including the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia: Provided, That of said annual appropriation of $275,000, not exceeding $100,000 thereof shall be expended for books in raised characters, and not exceeding $175,000 thereof shall be expended for sound-reproduction records."

SEC. 2. This act shall be applicable with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for each fiscal year thereafter.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOINT RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING ASSISTANT TO SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO SIGN OFFICIAL PAPERS AND DOCUMENTS

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 137) to amend Senate joint resolution dated March 28, 1918.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I object.

ELEVENTH INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS, BERLIN, GERMANY

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 193) to authorize an appropriation for the expenses of participation by the United States in the Eleventh International Dairy Congress, Berlin, Germany, in 1937.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

COMPLETING THE CONSTRUCTION OF A BRIDGE ACROSS THE DELAWARE RIVER NEAR TRENTON, N. J.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2895, to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Delaware River near Trenton, N. J.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill S. 715 be taken from the Speaker's table and substituted for this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, are the bills identical?

Mr. CHAPMAN. They are.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the bridge authorized by act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, to be built by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania and Newark Railroad Co. across the Delaware River near the city of Trenton, N. J., which has heretofore been extended by Congress to August 24, 1937, is hereby extended for a further period of 3 years from the last-named date: Provided, That it shall not be lawful to complete or commence the completion of said bridge until plans thereof shall again be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SAVANNAH RIVER AT OR NEAR LINCOLNTON, GA.

The Clerk read the title of the next bill, H. R. 3675, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Lincolnton, Ga.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Lincolnton, Ga., authorized to be built by the State of Georgia by an act of Congress approved February 24, 1933, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from February 24, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the figures "1933", insert "heretofore extended by an act of Congress approved August 30, 1935"; in line 8, after the word "hereby", insert the word "further."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO AUTHORIZE THE PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FISH

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I arise to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 4609), to authorize the purchase and distribution of products of the fishing industry, on the Consent Calendar, reported February 11, 1937, because of the emergency situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to may now be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I introduced, and the situation that it is predicated upon, making it an emergency, is as follows: We have had, as we all know, an unusually mild winter. As a result of that the fishing industry in the entire United States is in a condition which requires immediate consideration. As of January 15, there were 85,300,000 pounds of frozen fish in storage throughout the United States. That is 50 percent more than the average holdings of the last 5 years, and 37 percent more than last year. There is no authority under existing law for any agency of the Federal Government to purchase any part of this fish, and my bill also includes shellfish, for relief purpose or purposes in connection with the flood. The Red Cross can do it, but no Federal agency can. The W. P. A. has not been buying food for relief purposes for about 2 years. There is a very serious question as to whether it has the authority under the deficiency appropriation bill, but in any event, if they have such authority, it is a policy which they will not follow.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I understand this bill is to put products of the fisheries on a parity with products of agriculture?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; for the next 3 months only.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. For relief purposes?

Mr. McCORMACK. For 3 months.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Why confine it to 3 months?

Mr. McCORMACK. We have another bill amending the law permanently, and that bill is before the Committee on Agriculture, because the authority creating the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is a part of the three A's.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. It also became necessary to make it 90 days, or 3 months, because a number of applications might come in to the Committee on Agriculture to open up the Surplus Commodities Credit Corporation, and this is an emergency situation for fish. The gentleman from Massachusetts said 85,000,000 pounds. The amount is 87,000,000 pounds, not including canned goods and other things, and we thought we should treat the bill as an emergency and limit it to that time. Besides that, an emergency exists in the flooded section to get the food that we contemplate to give them at the present time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. If it is the purpose of the bill to provide food, then we are embarking upon a new policy. If what the gentleman from Virginia stated is the purpose of the bill, it seems to me it should not be considered here as a unanimous-consent measure, because we have other agencies of the Government providing for relief. If there are more fish in the gentleman's country than can be sold profitably, the gentleman should not come to Congress and ask for $2,000,000 to buy the fish in order that the Government might buy the fish to give to somebody as relief. We have a lot of agricultural products that are surplus.

Mr. McCORMACK. But they have a right to buy that under the Surplus Commodity Corporation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. As I understand it, we are doing for the fishing industry what we do for agriculture?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. The primary purpose is to get rid of the glut in the market. We do that for agricultural products. Last year approximately $160,000,000 was spent in purchasing agricultural products. That is the primary purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think they bought also citrus fruits.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; and in an emergency I think it is a proper function to equalize the law of supply and demand. It necessarily follows that if we make purchases the products purchased cannot be burned when we have to help unfortunate victims of the depression and of the flood. Agricultural products are distributed in that manner now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And may I suggest to the gentleman, if the Commodity Credit Corporation gives this relief that he is seeking, that he commit them to pay a certain price for the fish, and then the fishermen of New England and the Midwest will get the same quality of relief from the Corporation that the cotton growers of the South have from that Corporation, where they have had the price of cotton fixed at 12 cents a pound.

Mr. McCORMACK. We can come to that later. That is a fine suggestion for future consideration and I welcome it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Where does the $2,000,000 or the $1,000,000 come in?

Mr. McCORMACK. The committee considered all the evidence, and $2,000,000 the committee felt would meet the situation and remove this glutted condition.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Why put that figure in? Why not give authority to buy the fish?

Mr. McCORMACK. We had to put some figure in. We wanted a limitation of 90 days. If this were an amendment to permanent law, it would be a different proposition.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does the permanent law provide any limitation in figures on the purchase of farm products? Merely authority is given to buy.

Mr. McCORMACK. Subject to the Committee on Appropriations, but to meet the gentleman's suggestion the legislative committee would have to authorize the use of funds already appropriated, which would violate the rules of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is rather modest, always.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for the "always."

Mr. MICHENER. This is a bill for the relief of the fishing industry and not for the relief of sufferers.

Mr. McCORMACK. One follows the other.

Mr. MICHENER. But you want this relief for your fishermen and you are using people in distress as a sentimental agency to get it through the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. No, no. I do not want the gentleman, and no man in the House is more intellectually honest than he is, to get the wrong impression. The primary purpose is to try to meet the glutted situation of the market. The other is a natural and probable consequence of it. We do not want the fish purchased and then destroyed when there are human beings to whom it can be distributed in the flood area. That is where it probably will be used in the main. We have the same situation with respect to agriculture, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MICHENER. I will say this, that if another bill of this kind comes in to relieve any specific industry under unanimous consent, I do not care what it is or where it is, I shall object.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Is this similar to the bill that came before the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. In which the appropriation was $250,000?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. That was found inadequate.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. As I understand it, the reason for this legislation is because Mr. Hopkins refuses to use any of his relief money to purchase foods for people who are in distress?

Mr. McCORMACK. I would not want to say "refuses", because that creates a controversy.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Well, he refuses to give them fish as a part of their diet?

Mr. McCORMACK. The W. P. A. has not been buying food for the past 2 years out of relief funds. There is an honest difference of opinion as to whether or not they have the authority to do so. In any event, we were deadlocked. The net result, as far as we are concerned, is that we had to employ this procedure. So it is a condition.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. The gentleman is very ingenuous. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was put on the end of the Consent Calendar. There have been some unofficial committees appointed to try to look over these bills and give some consideration to bills that are coming up under unanimous consent. The committee has not had a copy of this bill. The committee did not think the bill would come up, and now, after the eligible bills have been finished, a bill appropriating $2,000,000 is suddenly called up when we have not even had a copy of the bill previously. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows, as does the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, that this matter could have been presented at least to the majority and minority committees in order to have time to read the bill. Another thing the gentleman from Massachusetts knows is that he can get a rule on this bill, or, if not, he can get it up under suspension of the rules, because he has sufficient influence in this House to do that.

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot plead guilty to that. I do not think the gentleman means that. I am just a Member of the House, the same as the gentleman is. I have the greatest feeling of pride in the fact that I am a Member of the House. I hope the gentleman will realize that there is no attempt to do anything but what is proper and honorable. I know the gentleman would not impute that; but the committee met on last Thursday.

Mr. BLAND. The bill was introduced on one day, and the committee realized it was of such great magnitude that it met the following day and reported it as soon as possible. It was introduced on the 10th and reported on the 11th.

Mr. McCORMACK. With a unanimous report.

Mr. BLAND. I had assumed that these bills were sent to members of the committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope objection will not come from my friend from Idaho. We did not have 3 legislative days in which to get it on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or out of funds appropriated for relief purposes, the sum of $2,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to divert surplus fish (including shellfish) and the products thereof from the normal channels of trade and commerce by acquiring them and providing for their distribution through Federal, State, and private relief agencies. No commodities shall be acquired under this act after 90 days after the date of its enactment: Provided, however, That distribution thereof may extend beyond said period. The provisions of law relating to the acquisition of materials or supplies for the United States shall not apply to the acquisition of commodities under this act.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 4, strike out "or out of funds appropriated for relief purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN PROSPECTING PERMITS

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4277) to provide for the extension of certain prospecting permits, and for other purposes, and that the bill be re-referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF SUSAN B. ANTHONY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, today is the one hundred and seventeenth anniversary of the birth of Susan B. Anthony. I should like to address the House in commemoration of that fact for 3 minutes, if I may have unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia that he be permitted to address the House for 3 minutes?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, can the Chair inform the House what suspensions will be brought up today?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has agreed to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] to call up Senate Joint Resolution No. 7, relating to the participation of the United States in an international exposition at Paris in 1937.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is the only one?

The SPEAKER. That is all today under suspensions.

The Chair has been informed that the Committee on Ways and Means hopes to call up a measure this afternoon.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the opportunity of today paying brief tribute to a great American woman—one whose name is known and honored throughout the Nation as the emancipator of woman—Susan B. Anthony.

Miss Anthony was born in a small community in Massachusetts, of splendid New England parentage, 117 years ago today. While still young, she began her fight for the recognition of women, which she carried on with courage and perseverance to the day of her death. She died without seeing the full fruits of her victory, but her work had paved the way for the enactment of the nineteenth amendment, and she stands today as a peerless leader in the progress of our country.

In carrying on her struggle for women's rights and suffrage, Susan B. Anthony was also working for all mankind through the emancipation of wives and mothers who at that time had no rights in the eyes of the law. A woman upon marrying became legally dead. She had no rights, no privileges under the law. Her husband acquired her property, her clothing, and could even will away her unborn child. The right to speak in public, to form organizations, to enter the professions, to secure a college education, all these had to be won through years of persecution and hardship.

I believe it would be interesting at this time to note the following passage from The Life and Work of Susan B. Anthony, by Ida Husted Harper. Referring to the suffrage convention held in Portland, Oreg., in 1905, the author makes the following interesting statement:

> A rare picture Miss Anthony made in the high-backed oaken chair, her snowy hair puffed over her ears in the olden fashion, and the collar of rose-point lace, which seemed to belong to dignified age, forming a lovely frame for her gentle but determined face. When she rose to call the meeting to order she was literally deluged with floral tributes, and drolly peering over the heaped-up flowers she said: "This is rather different than the receptions I used to get 50 years ago. They threw things at me then, but they were not roses. There were not epithets enough in Webster's Unabridged to express their feelings. Things are changed now, and I get flowers instead of eggs, compliments instead of epithets. I am thankful for this change which has come over the spirit of the American people."

The invaluable contributions of women and women's organizations to our national life make us realize the deep significance of the emancipation movement for women. At the helm of this stands Susan B. Anthony, whose leadership of this cause affecting the well-being of every man, woman, and child entitles her to be recognized along with the immortal Washington. As the liberator of millions of women, she is akin to Lincoln, and is righly deserving of the eternal gratitude of generations yet to come.

Susan B. Anthony, with unsurpassed courage and unparalleled perseverance, obtained for the women of America a heritage of freedom and opportunity. If we can all live up to the spirit of this great woman, we need never fear the future. "Failure is impossible" were the words she used in addressing her last convention, and we might all do well in repeating them often.

A great many men and women feel that a really tangible and lasting tribute to Susan B. Anthony would be accomplished by establishing her in the historic group of figures being carved from nature on Mount Rushmore. Congress and the President could bring this about. However, even though that is never done, we can join with the poet in the following tribute:

> She cut a path through tangled underwood
> Of old traditions out to broader ways;
> She lived to hear her work called brave and good.
> But oh! the thorns before the crown of bays!
> The world gives lashes to its pioneers
> Until the goal is reached, then deafening cheers.

[Applause.]

(Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FADDIS asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.)

PARTICIPATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION OF PARIS, 1937

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate Joint Resolution 70, relating to the participation by the United States in the International Exposition of Paris, 1937.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in addition to the authority heretofore granted by the joint resolution, approved April 10, 1936, relating to the participation by the United States in the International Exposition of Paris, 1937, the Commissioner General and the Commissioner are hereby authorized to make such expenditures as may be necessary for the purpose of purchasing, constructing, or renovating exhibits, for the proper housing of exhibits (including the decoration, operation, and maintenance of buildings by contract without regard to the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, or otherwise, and the payment of any obligations heretofore or hereafter incurred in connection with the employment of architects and engineers and reimbursement of their necessary travel expenses), and for the transportation of material and exhibits from the United States to France, and from France to the United States after the close of such exposition.

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of such resolution of April 10, 1936, the Commissioner General is authorized, without regard to the civil-service laws, to appoint, and without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the reasonable compensation of, such officers and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and of such resolution of April 10, 1936. This section shall be effective as of April 10, 1936.

SEC. 3. (a) Any functions granted to the Commissioner General and the Commissioner jointly may be exercised by either of them, and any authority herein granted to the Commissioner General may be delegated to the Commissioner or to any other person that the Commissioner General may designate for the purpose.

(b) The approval and certification of expenditures under this resolution, and the submission of accounts and vouchers, shall be made in the manner prescribed in section 4 of such resolution of April 10, 1936, except that any functions of the Secretary of State under such section may, in his discretion, be delegated, without release of responsibility, to any person he may designate for the purpose.

(c) Nothing in this resolution shall be construed to permit any indebtedness to be incurred in excess of the amount herein authorized to be appropriated.

SEC. 4. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for carrying out the purposes of this resolution, and of such resolution of April 10, 1936, the sum of $150,000, and the unexpended and unobligated balance of any sums heretofore appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in such resolution of April 10, 1936, shall also be available for the purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 5. The Commissioner General and the Commissioner are, with the approval of the Secretary of State, authorized to make available to any governmental agency such part of the sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the purposes of this resolution and such resolution of April 10, 1936, as may be effectively used by such agency to aid in carrying out such purposes.

SEC. 6. At the close of the exposition or when the connection of the Government of the United States therewith ceases, the Commissioner General and the Commissioner shall return all borrowed property and exhibits to their points of origin and shall dispose of any portion of the material contributed as may be unused or any property purchased in such manner as the Secretary of State may direct in the best interests of the Government, and account therefor.

Mr. MARTIN of Massaschusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, heretofore an appropriation of $50,000 was made for this Government to participate in the International Exposition of Paris in 1937, this year. The $50,000 was appropriated to cover the cost of the participation of the United States Government without any buildings or any permanent exhibits. We are now asking for an additional appropriation of $150,000 which is to be used for exhibit purposes only, not for any building or for the acquisition of any kind of housing, but for exhibits.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York states this appropriation is to be used only for exhibit purposes. How does he reconcile the language of the Secretary of State who said that was the main reason for the extra appropriation. That was the information given to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BLOOM. The correct information, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, is that the building is being provided for this Government. Our Government accepted the invitation to participate, and we appropriated $50,000 according to the resolution which was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]. The $150,000 provided in this bill is merely for participation, not for any building of any kind. The total of $200,000 is to be used for this purpose exclusively.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has this resolution, or a similar House resolution, been considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has it been recommended?

Mr. BLOOM. The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended the bill, and it was on the Consent Calendar 2 weeks ago. It was objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and was stricken from the calendar. I may say to the gentleman, also, that Senate Joint Resolution 70 was passed by the Senate and it is the resolution that is before us.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Was it unanimously recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. BLOOM. It was recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and was on the calendar. It is on the Union Calendar now.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman understands, of course, that I voted against the bill and another member of the committee voted against it.

Mr. BLOOM. I did not say how the gentleman voted.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. But the gentleman said it was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. BLOOM. I did not mean to say quite that. I meant to say it is on the calendar now.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There was objection from one Republican and from one Democrat against it.

Mr. BLOOM. I think it would be better that we did not go into that at the present time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I shall be very glad to have my reason for objecting stated.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. On page 2 of the letter written by Secretary of State Hull, it is distinctly stated:

> Obviously the cost of constructing the American building as well as preparing the transportation exhibit cannot be met by the original appropriation.

That is directly contrary to what the gentleman from New York has stated.

Mr. BLOOM. I beg your pardon. It is not. That is an entirely different and separate thing. That called for an appropriation of $200,000.

Mr. SNELL. All I know about it is the bill before us calls for $150,000.

Mr. BLOOM. That was an entirely separate thing. That bill called for $200,000.

Mr. SNELL. There is nothing in this letter stating anything about $200,000. This was written on January 23, not so very long ago.

Mr. BLOOM. That bill called for $200,000, and this bill calls for $150,000 and eliminates any building.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to have the gentleman show me that in the letter. Perhaps the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee can show it to me.

Mr. BLOOM. I very gladly yield to the gentleman, but I do not want to give up all my time.

Mr. SNELL. We will give the gentleman some time. Show me in the report what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman read House Joint Resolution 52?

Mr. SNELL. I am talking about what the Secretary of State said to your committee chairman in giving the reasons for the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLOOM. I am talking about House Joint Resolution 52 which called for an appropriation of $200,000, which is an entirely different and separate thing from the resolution now before the House.

Mr. SNELL. To what bill does the letter written by Mr. Hull to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] refer? It is dated Washington, D. C., January 23. To what bill does that refer?

Mr. BLOOM. That must refer to this bill because that was the only bill before the Foreign Affairs Committee, but that is an entirely separate bill.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. That had reference to a bill that was then pending before the committee calling for $200,000. That was the time when we thought we would have to build a building and the sum of $200,000 was asked for. There was some objection. Since that time the French Government has agreed to spend about $50,000 or something like that to erect a place for our exhibits; consequently the bill was redrawn in the Senate. I presume the gentleman has asked for consideration of the Senate bill, which calls for $150,000. We are not pushing the bill to which that letter refers.

Mr. SNELL. There is nothing in this bill covering a building?

Mr. BLOOM. No; absolutely not.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. No.

Mr. SNELL. But there was in the letter that the Secretary wrote?

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Yes; because we understood prior to that time the French Government was going to furnish the building, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] will remember.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say this matter was taken up by the Appropriations Committee informally this morning. Is not this the situation: Congress has heretofore passed a law authorizing the United States to participate in the Paris Exposition. That is gone. We have taken that step. Now, in order to participate in a way creditable to America, it is going to take $150,000 more than we thought it would for exhibit purposes only?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Was it not the intention at the time of the passage of that previous bill that the $50,000 would take care of the whole matter?

Mr. WOODRUM. We may have thought so at that time.

Mr. SNELL. It is the same old story.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. There was not a question raised at that time, and the bill was passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman gave the information to the House that $50,000 would cover everything.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. We thought so at the time, but it will not do it.

Mr. SNELL. It is the same old story. It is the same situation that comes up in connection with all these bills.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, this exposition in Paris is being participated in by practically all the nations of the world, and most of them are spending a considerable sum of money. I would like to read for the benefit of the Members, Mr. Speaker, the following:

> Germany has appropriated approximately $1,400,000; the Soviet Union, approximately $932,000; Italy, approximately $750,000; Belgium, approximately $570,000; and Great Britain, approximately $515,000.

The report says further that—

> While the amount contemplated for appropriation in the present resolution does not compare favorably with the amounts appropriated by others of the great nations, it is believed, after a careful study, a small exhibit which would reflect credit on this Government should be contemplated if action were taken immediately on the pending resolution.

May I also read from letter of Cordell Hull written on February 8, 1937:

> Both the President and I are interested in the early enactment of this legislation, and, in an effort to save time, I wish now to express this Department's entire approval of the enclosed draft. Should you require some specific information regarding the text of the resolution, I should be glad to send Mr. Sterling and Mr. Yeager to see you again at your convenience, since they are entirely familiar with the situation.

We have accepted the invitation, and the only way we can have a proper exhibit at this exposition, now that we are able to secure a building for exhibition purposes, is to appropriate the $150,000 as called for by this resolution in order to allow us to have a suitable and a representative exhibit.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, when this measure came up for consideration before the Committee on Foreign Affairs last year, it was understood the exhibit would cost this Government only $50,000. It was represented to us at that time that would be sufficient, and this rather quieted some Members like myself who are not overenthusiastic about large appropriations abroad in this time when there is a heavy deficit.

Of course, it is the same old story. The camel got his nose under the tent.

Now, they come back and want $200,000. The matter came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and one Democratic member of the committee and myself voted against the proposal. A letter from Secretary Hull was presented to the committee, stating because the French Government had failed to build pavilions it would be necessary for the United States Government to provide a building for its own exhibits and that this was the reason for the $200,000 which was asked.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, before I go any further, because I want to keep the record straight: Has there at any time been submitted to the committee or to the gentleman as chairman a break-down of where this extra $150,000 will be spent?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It has not been submitted to our committee.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. The Committee on Appropriations has a break-down of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Now I yield to the gentleman from Virginia, if he has that break-down.

Mr. WOODRUM. A break-down was presented to the Committee on Appropriations, and the matter was generally considered, but I did not see the break-down personally. The chairman had it in his hand, and no member of the committee on either side questioned the matter when it was explained to them. A break-down can be furnished, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I may say to the gentleman that I would think committees considering these problems should have such a break-down and such information should have been submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when we were considering the matter, because otherwise it is impossible for us to act intelligently.

The reason I opposed the matter casually, and not as seriously as I should have last year, was because I believe we are going too far in spending money loosely. I believe we should spend our money at home, and, God knows, there is going to be ample opportunity in America, with relief and what not, to spend our money here without wasting it abroad. I think when it is solemnly stated that $50,000 is all that would be needed they ought to be held to that statement.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman will recall that the first bill introduced, which was sent to the Foreign Affairs Committee, was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], of the Committee on Appropriations, and the bill asked for $20,000. When the committee had the measure before it for consideration, without even going into any break-down, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] or someone else suggested that that would not be enough for an exhibit and suggested that the amount be raised to $50,000, and it was raised to $50,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And was it not understood at that time that that amount would be sufficient?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There was nothing said about its sufficiency. It was just stated that $20,000 would not be sufficient, and they raised it to $50,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken on that point, because I expressly recall someone told me that would be all they would ask for and promised they would not come back again.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think the gentleman is in error, because I do not recall that.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not in error, and I know that.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman knows it, then I am in error.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; I do not say the gentleman is in error, because the gentleman might not have heard it. I would not accuse the gentleman of being in error about it at all.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why would it not be a good idea to increase this amount to $500,000 and let the Republic of France construct the building and then credit that country with that amount on what she owes us?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from New York will accept an amendment to take the appropriation out of what the French Government owes us, I shall not object.

Mr. KNUTSON. I shall not object, either, and would then support it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will that be agreeable to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman from New York could not answer that, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing to let this entire appropriation be made if we can deduct it from the amount France owes us.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman is asking me?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes; will the gentleman agree to that? [Laughter.]

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. Can the gentleman or the committee inform us whether or not the members of the Commission and the Commissioner General have been appointed and who they are?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not know whether the Commission has been appointed or not, but there are several men who are quite active in trying to get this legislation through, so I would imagine they either have been appointed or are slated to be appointed.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman will permit, the Commissioners are serving without pay. The Commissioner General does not get any pay.

Mr. McLEAN. Who are they?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Sterling, I believe, is one and Mr. Watson is one. They are serving without any pay, and I may say to the gentleman that there has never been an exposition held anywhere in the world where you could do what the Government of the United States is going to do at this exposition for $200,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman remember that we expected $50,000 to be sufficient, last year?

Mr. BLOOM. Does the gentleman want me to answer that?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Certainly; else I would not have asked the gentleman.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] first introduced this bill, and the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for the bill. It calls for participation and for $20,000. That was raised in the committee to $50,000. The gentleman remembers that. The question was brought up at that time as to how we could participate in an exposition for $50,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. This is an important matter, and I think we should have a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. KNUTSON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute more.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I understand this entire amount is to be spent for governmental expenditures and for construction to complete the building already started. I have seen the items approved by the Budget. Mr. Speaker, the United States is a great nation. When our flag flies in a foreign country it must fly in dignified surroundings. Our exhibit must be dignified and adequate. Also, Mr. Speaker, I do not forget Lafayette; I do not forget the heroic part France played in the World War. Also, Mr. Speaker, we are committed to exhibit in France. I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It develops today they have abandoned all building construction. The money is to be expended only for exhibit purposes. Two letters have been written, one to the Senate and one to the House, which are rather conflicting, and we are now considering the Senate bill, where no building will be required. I hope this bill will not be agreed to, because there is a principle involved here; that when sponsors come before a committee and say they can get along with a certain amount for an exhibit they should be held to that. Therefore, I am opposed to the measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a year ago we had a proposition put up to us to expend $50,000 for participation in the International Exposition in Paris. Congress very complacently passed that appropriation, and now we are confronted with a situation where we are asked to raise that $50,000 to $200,000. There is nothing indicating whether or not the first $50,000 has been expended or whether there is any need for the expenditure of more than the first $50,000. It seems to be the practice these days to raise an appropriation just as high as we can reach, and we have not here anything definite in the way of a policy, because on the 23d of January 1937 the Secretary of State sends a letter to Mr. MCREYNOLDS, the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, suggesting that it is necessary to construct a building in order that the $50,000 that we authorized for an exhibit might operate effectively; that is, provide a proper pavilion to put it in. There was no intimation that the $50,000 was not enough for taking the exhibits over there and participation on the part of the United States in the exposition. Now comes a letter to Senator PITTMAN, dated February 8, from the Secretary of State, indicating that they want $150,000 for participation, and nothing is said about the building, and now we are told as the bill comes on the floor that $200,000 is to be used for taking the exhibits over there and for participation. That indicates that the cost of taking the exhibits over there and the participation has been multiplied by four in the period from January 23 to February 4.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. To inquire what would be the nature of these exhibits. Are they exhibits of something of the Government or that private citizens may participate?

Mr. TABER. I expect that gentlemen on the Foreign Affairs Committee might be able to answer that better than I.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And under what terms and conditions will American citizens be permitted to exhibit?

Mr. BLOOM. These are all Government exhibits, the same as we exhibit in Dallas or Chicago.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I should like to know what exhibits go over there.

Mr. BLOOM. Different departments will exhibit things over there, such as the Department of Commerce, the Department of the Interior, and all the different departments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Has there been no statement to indicate the range of these exhibits and the character of them? We certainly have to know that before we know what it would cost to send them over there.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Let me say to my friend from Kentucky that in every exhibition of any moment, whether in America or abroad, this Government has participated by sending a more or less standard class of exhibits.

Natural resources, minerals, products of our factories and industries have all been sent there to represent this country. It is something you have to do whether you want to do it or not. That is the situation in which the Government finds itself.

Mr. TABER. I suppose there will be an exhibit from the Resettlement Administration. Perhaps that is the reason they are multiplying the cost of this performance by four.

Mr. KNUTSON. We can put some of those French bonds on exhibit over there.

Mr. TABER. Perhaps that would be a good scheme. It does seem to me that when the State Department changes its ideas as to the cost of running this operation by multiplying it four times in 2 weeks, we ought to turn it down. I hope we will do that.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman remember how much we spent when we exhibited in Belgium some years ago?

Mr. TABER. I do not have any idea.

Mr. BLOOM. We have not exhibited in Belgium.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS].

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. Of course, you know there was no argument in it. I was wondering, when he said he would not vote for an appropriation to hold an exhibit in France, how the gentleman voted in 1930 or 1932 when we had an exhibit over there and $300,000 was expended. Quite a leading Republican was sent over there at $10,000 a year. I think, if the gentleman will examine the record, he will find that he voted for it. I am not sure. I am asking.

Mr. KNUTSON. I believe that statement is in error. I never voted a dollar for France in my life.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. That may be in error. No one is asking for an appropriation for France. That is all bunk.

How did this start? It started with a bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], on the Republican side, a man who stands next in rank on the Committee on Appropriations. I have sent for him to come in and defend his bill. It started with Mr. BACON's introducing a bill for $20,000. We held no hearings to amount to anything, but we knew that that was not sufficient, and of our own motion we raised it to $50,000, and it came before this House and was passed by unanimous consent.

There was a bill introduced this time for $200,000, when it was thought we would have to build a building. It later developed that we would not have to build the building; that the French would spend the $50,000, so it was only necessary to have the additional appropriation of $150,000 to have this exhibit. A great amount of this money will be spent in America. This country has already accepted an invitation, and preparations are being made for our exhibit.

Now I appeal to you: What kind of a position would you leave the United States of America in if you do not go through with it?

Let me say to the gentleman from New York, you have before our committee a bill calling for an authorization for an appropriation of $5,000,000 for a world's fair in New York. Do you expect, after accepting an invitation to have an exhibit in France, to have France participate unless you carry out your agreement? I venture to say the gentleman from New York is for that $5,000,000.

Mr. TABER. I have no bill before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The New York delegation, I mean.

Mr. TABER. I do not know who has it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I shall be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars will rehabilitate 150 families in Tennessee who have been drowned out by the flood, at $1,000 per family.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It will?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is not this the situation, that when we made the original appropriation we had no idea of the extent either of money or exhibits that other nations of the world were going to bring to this exposition in Paris; that when it became known, not only in France but in other sections of the world, what sort of an exhibit and what sort of a showing the United States was going to make they were absolutely shocked? Now, we are dealing with a great and a proud people. We represent here a great and a proud people. We want to lead the people of France to think that if we participate in this exhibit at all we are going to do something commensurate with our greatness and with what France thinks is her greatness and what we believe it to be. Is it not the situation that we are humiliated and that the French people are humiliated and shocked at what they understood we were going to do with reference to this matter?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct, and I appreciate his remarks very much.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the beginning, but little consideration was being given at that time to what the other countries would do; we did not know. The gentleman from New York has shown the membership of this House that the expenditures of the other nations far exceed what we are asking be spent by our Government.

As I understand, the Appropriations Committee has made no objection to this appropriation.

We have accepted the invitation to participate in this world's fair. Are we going through with it? I say we are in honor bound to do so.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman emphasize the fact that this money is not being appropriated for France and that no considerable portion of it will be used to pay Frenchmen? It will be used to pay for American participation, not in a French exposition but in a great world exposition, where citizens of the whole world will gage the various countries by their exhibits.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is emphasizing what I said before.

Mr. WOODRUM. And it is the smallest amount our participation in a world exposition has ever cost.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct; it is the smallest amount that participation in a world's exposition has ever cost this country. It is not an expenditure for France, it is an expenditure for ourselves.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. EATON. I am firmly of the conviction that if we go abroad at all we ought to go in a manner worthy of the greatness and grandeur of this Nation; but I think the method of bringing this proposition before the House is most unfortunate, because it has been presented in piecemeal and in a roundabout way. I wish that we had had it properly before our committee so that the fine intelligence of that committee could have brought in a bill which would have met instant approval.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The trouble right now is that we had such little time that we could not go further, but had to take the Senate bill. We did have it before the committee.

Mr. BLOOM. The committee reported out a House bill for $200,000.

Mr. EATON. I know; it shows that we are all cracked.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I want the Members to know that we accepted the invitation of France to participate in this exposition. It is our exhibit. The money does not go to France. It goes for the American exhibits. It is necessary for us to have sufficient money to make a proper showing.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Recently a world's fair was held in the city of Chicago and millions and millions of dollars were spent there by foreign countries in placing before the world, so to speak, proper exhibits. Without that money the world's fair in Chicago would have amounted to nothing.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, that is about all we have to say. The administration wants this. Because we have accepted the invitation we ought to have sufficient money to make a proper showing for the great Nation which you and I represent.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and Senate Joint Resolution 70, relating to the participation by the United States in the International Exposition of Paris, 1937, be passed?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 126, noes 41.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 245, nays 104, not voting 83, as follows:

Mr. TINKHAM changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

The doors were opened.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion by Mr. MCREYNOLDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF AN EXCISE TAX UPON CARRIERS AND AN INCOME TAX UPON THEIR EMPLOYEES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 212, to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, and ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I question the propriety of bringing in these resolutions without the Members of the House having a chance to give some consideration to their contents. I am not going to object at this time, but hereafter I shall insist that at least 24 hours' notice be given before these resolutions are called up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 12 of the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, is amended by striking out "February 28, 1937", and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1938."

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request that due to the very serious illness of his brother, my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] be granted an indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire whether there is any other special business to come before the House this afternoon?

Mr. RAYBURN. There is nothing else, I may say to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Speaker, charges of rank partisanship, of an un-American attack on the Constitution, of animus against the Supreme Court, have filled the air since President Roosevelt's message recommending the reorganization of the Federal courts.

Of course, these charges have no foundation in fact. The President first proposed reorganization of the Government departments and agencies in the interest of efficiency in serving the public. His proposals were specific, with the general plan outlined for the consideration of Congress.

Next the President proposed reorganization of the Federal courts in the interest of efficiency in serving the public. Again he presented a specific plan, fully outlined, with reasons for each recommendation clearly presented.

Conservatives and reactionaries and bitter partisans are making an outcry against both of these suggested reorganizations. But as yet the charge that reorganization of the departments is an attack on the Cabinet members who head these departments has not been made. Clearly, such a charge would be absurd.

Just as absurd is the charge that the proposal to reorganize the Federal courts is an attack on the judges of the court, or on the Constitution.

Partisan and reactionary opposition emanating from those who opposed President Roosevelt's reelection is to be expected and discounted. But the fear of sincere people who might be led to believe that the Constitution is endangered must be given every consideration.

To my mind, this fear is groundless, and the way to allay it is to study, analyze, and understand the President's reorganization plan. Following this procedure, one discovers that it in no way trespasses upon the Constitution, and that it makes no change whatsoever in the relation between the Congress, the Executive, and the judiciary. It therefore does not disturb the balance among the three branches of the Government.

POWER GRANTED CONGRESS BY CONSTITUTION

Refer to the Constitution, article III, sections 1 and 2, and you will find all that is determined in regard to the judiciary. Here is what the Constitution says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Please note that there is not one word granting to the Supreme Court the right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. But from 1803, when Chief Justice John Marshall went out of his way to enunciate this power, it has been recognized, though seldom exercised.

Note also that the only court established by the Constitution is the Supreme Court and that the number, qualifications, salary, and jurisdiction are determined by Congress. The Constitution specifies in what cases the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction, and then says:

> In all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Summarizing, we find that the Constitution grants to Congress the power—

First. To determine the number of judges of the Supreme Court.

Second. The qualifications of judges of the Supreme Court.

Third. The salary of the judges of the Supreme Court.

Fourth. To determine and make regulations as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Fifth. To establish inferior courts and make all rules and regulations for such courts, including, of course, the personnel and jurisdiction.

NUMBER OF JUDGES CHANGED SIX TIMES

First on this list is the power of Congress to determine the number of judges in the various Federal courts, including the Supreme Court. This number has been changed by Congress at various times.

The Supreme Court was established with 6 members in 1789; it was reduced to 5 in 1801; it was increased to 7 in 1807; it was increased to 9 in 1837; it was increased to 10 in 1863; it was reduced to 7 in 1866; it was increased to 9 in 1869.

The President now proposes that under certain conditions additional judges may be added to the Supreme Court. The Congress has changed the number of judges six times; it has the unquestioned constitutional authority to do this. Yet the proposal has brought a roar from the industrial royalists and their attorneys and satellites throughout the land. All charge that this is an attack on the Constitution and the courts. Since it is merely a proposal for Congress to exercise its constitutional right, the outcry is unwarranted and should not confuse the issue.

The issue, as I see it, is: Shall we continue to have congestion in our Federal courts, at great cost and loss to our people? Shall we permit our inferior Federal courts to continue to issue injunctions setting aside or suspending the laws of Congress, thus entailing long delay and uncertainty, while the interminable red tape of getting a case through the courts is unwound? Shall we continue to have an act of Congress subjected to being declared unconstitutional by one lower court and constitutional by another, until no one knows what is law and what is judicial whim? And, most important of all, shall we continue to have the progressive statutes of Congress declared unconstitutional by a vote of 5 to 4 in the Supreme Court?

I think the American people can be depended upon to demand that Congress use its constitutional power and put a stop to this crude parody of law and government.

THE PROPOSAL IS NOT RADICAL

The charge that this involves "packing" the Court is made by those who wish the Court to remain packed as it now is, with five judges exercising the veto power over acts of Congress. I say, it is time to unpack the Court.

An early advocate of this plan was former Attorney General McReynolds, now a Supreme Court Justice. In 1913 he made this recommendation:

> I suggest an act providing when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law, that the President be required, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge, who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one.
> This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court.

Attorney General Gregory made the same recommendation in 1914, 1915, and 1916. In 1919 the House of Representatives passed a bill that failed in the Senate because it had indefinite provisions. In 1919 and again in 1928 the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court endorsed the plan.

Surely this is sufficient to dispel the fear that this is a radical or unfair or unsound plan. It is merely the effort to put into law a needed reorganization of the courts, long recognized as necessary in the interest of efficiency and justice.

PROPAGANDA FOR DELAY

As for me, I take my stand in support of the President's proposed reorganization of the courts. I am not listening to the subtle propaganda for delay until a constitutional amendment can be put through. Immediately after the Supreme Court began to declare unconstitutional the acts which constituted the keystone of the New Deal I introduced a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment clearly giving to Congress the right to legislate in regard to wages and hours of labor in interstate commerce, defined in a way to include the production and sale of goods between the States, and not confined to transportation only. But I am convinced that such an amendment—any amendment—will take so long to put through that great hardship and even national disaster might occur in the interim.

We need only consider the sad status of the child-labor amendment to realize the difficulty of getting an amendment adopted. In 1916 Congress passed an act prohibiting transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at factories employing child labor. By a vote of 5 to 4 the Supreme Court declared this unconstitutional. In 1919 Congress passed the so-called Child Labor Tax Act. In 1923 it was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

Then resort was taken to a constitutional amendment. This, the child-labor amendment, has been before the States for ratification for 13 years. Every effort has been made by the exploiters to prevent its ratification. To date they have been successful. And this in spite of the fact that an overwhelming majority of the people favor this amendment.

This is discouraging. And it convinces me that the Congress must take prompt and courageous action if progressive legislation is to be saved. The President's plan to enlarge the personnel of the Supreme Court, to inject new blood and a new spirit, should be adopted.

PUBLIC WELFARE DEMANDS ACTION

If we wait for a constitutional amendment in order to end child labor throughout the land, to eliminate the sweatshop through a minimum wage and maximum hour law, to prevent unfair trade practices ruinous alike to labor, to the consumer, and to the honest competitor, the delay will be ruinous to millions of our people.

If these rabid opponents of the President's proposal would expend one-half the energy they are wasting in this battle in an effort to have the child-labor amendment adopted, that very salutary measure would now be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

The facts are, however, that, with the exception of a few outstanding liberals, the great mass of those opposing the President are of the same ilk and character as the opponents of the child-labor amendment.

Children will continue to labor in mills and factories and sweatshops. Slums and poverty will continue to be fostered by sweatshops and profiteers. The consumer will continue to be cheated and exploited. Labor will continue to get so small a share of their production that they will be denied the high standard of living that can alone save this country from collapse. We cannot continue to permit corporations to pile up profits, while labor struggles for a bare living. We cannot in safety continue to permit profits to increase at a ratio away beyond that of wages. We must give every man and woman in this Nation a chance to live and earn and enjoy an American standard of living.

And we cannot do so if we permit five eminent reactionaries on the Supreme Court to decide what laws we can pass and enforce and what we must abandon. These men are legal-minded; they are corporation-minded; they were nourished on the discredited economy of laissez faire; they do not believe in Government "interference" in business; they are doubtless honest and sincere in thinking that the public-welfare clause of the Constitution is not to be taken seriously, while the tragically perverted "without due process of law" clause is to be utilized against every law that looks too progressive to be safe. Thus five reactionaries exercise the veto power over legislation which they are temperamentally unable to see as constitutional, because it is out of line with the old economics.

The American electorate spoke last November. It gave a clear mandate for the Congress to proceed with the President's program. To quibble over fine spun interpretations of the Constitution, while the people perish, is abhorrent to me. I have no enthusiasm for the maintenance of customs and beliefs sanctified by the years unless they serve humanity.

THIS IS THE DAY OF THE NEW DEAL

I have no feeling as to the sanctity of the old ways. My enthusiasm is for people, for human welfare, for righting wrong and inhuman conditions in industry, for bringing opportunity to all, for making the United States a land of happy people in comfortable homes, working under fair conditions, with all sharing in the abundant wealth and productive power of this great democracy.

I revere and respect the Constitution. And that is why it breaks my heart to see its interpretation in the control of a court made up largely of fine old reactionaries, devoted to trying to maintain the old ways and the old order, and representing the viewpoint of three former Presidents, all corporation-minded and all looking upon this country as a happy hunting ground for the trusts, the Wall Street bankers, the utilities crowd, and for the lawyers who so ably represent these special interests in the courts.

This is the day of the New Deal. The people expect the Congress to extend and support it. They want us to march forward with the President. They want action. And I think they are going to get it.

I am confident that the Judiciary Committee, made up as it is of able lawyers, will not let their legalistic attitude and training blind them as to the clear path ahead. They know that the country does not want government by legal and technical quibble. They have the ability to puncture the fallacious arguments being presented in the press and by paid attorneys for special interests. I sincerely hope that the committee will promptly report the bill for reorganization of the judiciary and thus give the representatives of the people the opportunity for free and ample discussion and a vote. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORD of California, Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts, Mr. CROWE, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by Hon. HUGO BLACK, a distinguished Senator from the State of Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short paragraph from the Washington News of last week.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to the insertion of the News item.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I modify my request and ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have heard of economic royalists, and I just heard a statement made a few moments ago by the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD] about a constitutional royalist, and I hope the gentleman from California will define that in his remarks today, if possible.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'MALLEY (at the request of Mr. CURLEY), indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his brother.

To Mr. LANHAM (at the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas), for today, on account of important public business.

To Mr. CROWE, for today, on account of official business.

To Mr. BUCHANAN (at the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas), indefinitely, on account of illness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God be merciful unto us and bless us, and cause his mercy to shine upon us, that Thy way may be known upon earth and Thy saving grace among all nations. Heavenly Father, lift us up into large spheres and create within us a satisfying sense of the glory and value of life. Let our souls draw new breath and vigor from an expanding spiritual life that hears the passion for humanity throbbing in the breast of Jesus. Catching the fire of His public soul, inspire us to do our part in healing the open sores of our country; may we rise in moral triumph in a mission of service for our fellow men. "For Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through Thy works; I will triumph in the works of Thy hands." We thank Thee for Thy providences that know all our wants and supply all our necessities. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address I made in Philadelphia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE PETTENGILL BILL

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, at a meeting of Congressmen opposed to H. R. 1668 (the Pettengill bill) held in the caucus room of the House Office Building on February 16, 1937, Hon. KNUTE HILL of Washington was elected chairman, and Hon. JERRY J. O'CONNELL of Montana secretary, and a steering committee of seven was appointed to oppose this proposed legislation, as follows:

Hon. WALTER M. PIERCE, of Oregon, chairman; Hon. JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi; Hon. FRANCIS CULKIN, of New York; Hon. D. WORTH CLARK, of Idaho; Hon. JERRY J. O'CONNELL, of Montana; Hon. HENRY C. LUCKEY, of Nebraska; and Hon. CLIFFORD HOPE, of Kansas.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a statement of that committee, together with the summary of testimony of Joseph B. Eastman, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The statement and summary are as follows:

STATEMENT OF STEERING COMMITTEE

It should be made clear that this bill appears to be the answer of the Wall Street owners of railway stocks and bonds to the development of waterways and motor trucking. It has, apparently, resulted from determination to prevent the benefits of progress in transportation from accruing to producers, who are now feeling some relief on account of competition of trucks and waterways.

Opponents are convinced that this bill, if enacted into law, would open the way for further discrimination against the inland farmers, merchants, and shippers, who bear, equally with others, the costs of State and National Governments.

This proposed legislation undoubtedly had its origin in Wall Street, perhaps aided by some of the industrial centers which desire easier access to tidewater. It is opposed by most of the interior country, it is opposed by the beneficiaries of our great waterways program, it is opposed by those who live at tidewater and are dependent upon the protection of water-borne traffic.

It is favored and promoted by Wall Street owners of railroad securities, by a certain geographical section which seeks unfair advantage, and, most strangely, by most railway laborers who have been misled into the belief that this legislation would result in increased employment and wages. The railway representatives who have visited towns and cities with their propaganda for this bill, and have secured letters from individuals and resolutions from organizations favoring it, have, almost without exception, secured letters from individuals and resolutions from organizations against the legislative program of railway labor, including the 6-hour day, full crew, train length, and unemployment-insurance measures. Certainly it does not appear that the railways managements are expressing particular interest in railway labor, and it is most clearly apparent that railway labor would not benefit from this proposed legislation. It is most unfortunate that the influence of this railway-labor group should be in any way instrumental toward passage of legislation for the sole benefit of those who seek to deny them the benefits for which they have struggled.

A half century ago the Congress of the United States enacted a law creating the Interstate Commerce Commission. That law resulted from the demands of farmers, shippers, and merchants who were in open rebellion against the injustice of railway rates, an injustice similar to that proposed under the pending legislation. The original act has been amended several times, always to strengthen the long-and-short-haul clause of the Transportation Act.

Whether transportation lines should have a right to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul, over the same lines going in the same direction, has been a mooted question ever since the railroads came into existence. In 1920 the present fourth section of the Transportation Act was passed by the Congress. The great Rocky Mountain interior had suffered more severely from unjust railroad tariffs prior to 1920 than any other part of the United States. Rates for eastward shipments of wool and wheat were often much higher from the mountain region of the western half of the United States than were the rates for a point many hundreds of miles farther west. On the other hand, traffic rates for products of eastern industries used in that great intermountain region were far higher than they were for terminals on the Pacific coast. In other words, noncompetitive points were obliged to pay the through-traffic rates from coast to coast and then the so-called back haul, which was often more than the entire haul across the continent.

This unjust situation was changed to some extent 17 years ago when the fourth section of the Transportation Act was enacted. The Interstate Commerce Commission was given the power to grant fourth section relief to transportation lines upon proper showing. That relief has been granted in many cases and denied in very few. When denied, the Interstate Commerce Commission has had convincing reasons.

One year ago a bill was introduced into Congress known as the Pettengill bill. It passed the House, not on its merits but on account of propaganda for its enactment put out by the railroad companies. A potent factor in its success in the House was the support of railway labor, based on a mistaken assumption that they were to have the cooperation of railway management to better their condition. The bill died in the Senate in committee. Practically the same bill is again before us. Extensive hearings have been held before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The enactment of H. R. 1668, modifying the fourth section of the Transportation Act, is opposed by those geographical sections and producing groups, heretofore mentioned, which would undoubtedly be penalized by heavier freight rates, as well as by water carriers, motor vehicles, and the beneficiaries of those modes of transportation. We desire to enumerate, for illustration, names of some of the organizations which are now actively opposing this bill, and whose representatives appeared before the committee this year. This list does not include names of private firms which have appeared in opposition.

Farm and producer organizations: National Grange; National Farmers' Union; Farmers' Union Terminal Association; Farmers' Union Jobbing Association; Farmers' Union Livestock Commission; Farmers' Cooperative Commission; North Pacific Grain Growers' Legislative Committee; Farmers' National Grain Corporation; American Wheat Growers, Inc.; American Wheat Growers, of Aberdeen, S. Dak.; Colorado Grain Growers; Farmers' West Central Grain Co.; Indiana Grain Producers, Inc.; Illinois Grain Corporation; Inter-Mountain Grain Cooperative; Iowa Cooperative Grain Co.; Missouri Grain Growers, Inc.; Northwest Grain Association; Ohio Grain & Supply Association; Oklahoma Grain Growers' Association; Producers' Grain Commission Co. of Texas; Wheat Growers, Inc.; American Livestock Association; Coastwise Lumber Conference.

Port authorities and maritime associations: Port authorities of St. Paul, San Diego, Portland, Oreg., and many other west coast ports; Inland Waterways Association; Upper Mississippi Waterways Association; St. Croix River Improvement Association of Minnesota; Missouri River Navigation Association; Mississippi Valley Association; Maritime Association of Boston; Maritime Association of the Port of New York; Pacific Coastwise Conference.

Sectional groups: Michigan Elevator Exchange; Spokane Chamber of Commerce; Memphis Freight Bureau; Twin Falls, Idaho; Snake River Valley; railroad rate department of Corporation Commission of Oklahoma; New York State Chamber of Commerce; Baltimore Association of Commerce.

Labor organizations: Waterfront Employees' Association of San Francisco; International Seamen's Union of America.

Steamship and trucking associations: American Trucking Association; Pacific American Steamship Association; Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast; American Steamship Owners' Association; International Steamship Freight Association; Inter-Coastal Steamship Freight Association.

Those in favor of the bill claim that its passage will enable the railroads to compete more freely with other forms of transportation and add largely to their revenue and to the increase of wages for their employees. The proponents also claim that the net earnings can be increased by taking all traffic at so-called out-of-pocket costs because they now haul many cars empty. The opponents of the bill claim that its passage will restore the conditions that existed prior to 1920, and enable the railroads to levy a much heavier tariff to and from noncompetitive points. They feel that it will not increase employment; that it may result in ruining what competition they have now in terminal points, and also the advantages of development of water and motor transportation. It may result in larger revenues to the railroads, but if it does so result, that increased income will be exacted from already overburdened interior points that are paying more than they ought to be paying in traffic rates. Producers cannot continue to ship their products if rates are increased. They are just recovering from a depression which has been felt most severely on farms. They bear an unduly large proportion of the tax burden. They are under compulsion of readjustment of their agricultural programs. The additional burden of the increased rates, which would probably result from the passage of this bill, would place them in a desperate situation.

No one can accuse the Interstate Commerce Commission of being antagonistic to the railroads. If the object of this bill is simply to allow the transportation lines to make lower rates from Atlantic to Pacific coast terminals, or from one water terminal to another water terminal, and those rates must be compensatory, then it is clear that there would not be such rate reduction as would in any way affect the water rates. If traffic is to be carried from one water terminal to another at a loss in order to drive the water transportation out of business, then that loss must be made up by charging a much higher rate between noncompetitive interior points—precisely what was done prior to 1920.

In one statement the railroad companies claim that they will not need any more trains, any more men, or any more expense to carry the increased traffic from ocean to ocean or from the Lakes to the Gulf, owing to the fact that they are now running empty cars. On the other hand, they tell their employees that they can give their men more employment and more wages. Their statements are certainly contradictory.

It is the opinion of the opponents of the bill that the transportation lines are very anxious to have H. R. 1668 enacted into law, so that they may be able to restore the old practice of charging more for a short haul than for a long haul. This would again force interior points like Helena, Spokane, Salt Lake, El Paso, and others to pay more for freight from the East than would be paid at Pacific coast terminals, as well as interior points between the Lakes and the Gulf. This would place interior points at a decided disadvantage. Again, we repeat that it is the business of Government to prevent just such discrimination.

The changing of the present law by the passage of H. R. 1668 will not create any new traffic. It must be intended to divert traffic from water lines and the motor trucks to railroad lines, and will result in killing off interior points. The railroads have never recognized the necessity for a fair and reasonable charge. It has always been their policy to charge all that traffic will bear, with complete disregard of public interest. The only relief from excessively high freight rates that the country has had has been the competition afforded by waterways and motor trucks. The interior of the country found great relief when the trucks came and were able to compete with railway transportation lines for traffic. The last Congress passed legislation that has tended to strangle highway transportation for the benefit of the railroads. H. R. 1668 is just another step in the process of destroying the advantages of competition and penalizing interior points.

Under the operation of the proposed bill, railroad lines would be able to post their increased traffic rates and collect the same after 30 days. A shipper feeling aggrieved may appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief. If he so appeals, he will have to make his own showing before the Commission and hire his own attorney. The great distance from the National Capital and from the centers where hearings are held would make it a very expensive thing for the shippers and producers to state their cases. Such procedure would make it practically impossible to secure justice. The hearing may take many months or years, during which the railroad is allowed to collect its higher tariff. All the relief to which the railroad lines are entitled can be granted under the present law by the Interstate Commerce Commission if lines show the necessity of such relief. This is surely more just than to have the burden of proof placed on the shipper. To be sure, there is a clause in the bill which purports to place the burden on the railway, but in fact the burden will be on the shipper.

Should the Congress enact this bill into law, the Commission and the courts must accept it as a mandate from Congress to construe more liberally every question of tariff rates in favor of the railroad companies and against the shipper and the public. The Commission will have a right to believe that the Congress seeks to hamper, kill, and ruin water and motor-truck transportation.

The railroads may have difficulty in earning dividends upon their greatly inflated valuations and overcapitalization. The right to such rates is not recognized by the public, which believes that the rail lines must take their losses in capitalization just as such losses have been taken by the farmers and small-business men.

The opponents consider this bill as an attempt to turn over the resources of the Nation to the owners of the stocks and bonds of the rail lines so that they shall suffer no devaluation, but be able to collect dividends upon many billions of dollars never actually invested. The railroads were subsidized with millions of acres of land and millions of dollars from local bond issues. They have received hundreds of millions in loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and still they clamor for more. The insatiate greed of Wall Street that owns, controls, and manages these railroads seems impossible to satisfy.

Most striking, important, and unanswerable testimony against this bill has been offered by Joseph B. Eastman, member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, speaking before the House committee on behalf of the whole Commission. His statements should be made available for study by Members of the House before action on the bill is called for. A brief summary of that testimony, setting forth the striking conclusions, is already available. Those in doubt about the bill should also read the speeches which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last session. There is plenty of evidence that it would not be wise nor fair to enact this bill into law.

SUMMARY OF TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH B. EASTMAN, MEMBER OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE, FEBRUARY 9 AND 10, 1937, ON H. R. 1668

I have undertaken to show you—

First. That the long-and-short-haul clause has been part of the law for 50 years; that it was enacted in response to strong and outraged public opinion to correct an abuse which had become widespread; and that this agitation persisted for many years until the original defects in the section had been remedied. A law with such a history ought not lightly to be repealed or emasculated.

Second. That it is proposed to substitute for this clause an untried provision which, it can be argued, could conceivably be used to produce much the same results. If this is true, there is no sense in making the change. It is clear, however, that those who favor the bill do not believe it to be true, because they confidently urge that it will produce very different results. They have reason for this belief, because the Commission and the courts would find it difficult to avoid the conclusion that Congress, when it changed the law, intended also to change the policy and the results, and because, in any event, the Commission would encounter very great, and probably insuperable, practical difficulties in applying the present policy and producing the present results.

Third. That while there may, perhaps, be some reasonable ground for complaint because of delay in the administration of the fourth section in certain cases in the past, the present administration is expeditious. If it is desired to insure expedition in the future, this can be done by providing the same time limit as in suspension cases.

Fourth. That the chief reason offered for the bills is that it will have the result of enabling the railroads to compete more freely with other forms of transportation and thus add largely to their revenues and employment. Upon analysis it is clear that it is from the water carriers that this traffic is to be taken. The bill is directed chiefly against them. The facts are that the Commission has been liberal in granting fourth-section relief to enable the railroads to compete with water carriers. The complaint that it has not been liberal centers on transcontinental rates and the competition of the intercoastal water carriers. The facts are that the Commission had good reason for denying relief in the case of these transcontinental rates; but even had it been granted, not enough traffic is involved to affect appreciably the earnings of the western railroads, especially when the reductions in rates which would undoubtedly be made by the eastern railroads and the water lines are taken into account.

Fifth. That the theory that net earnings can be improved by taking on traffic at so-called out-of-pocket costs is full of fallacies and dangers, because such costs are a highly uncertain and fluctuating quantity. They are only low when no employment is required, but the proponents of this bill claim that the traffic which it will add will increase railroad employment greatly.

Sixth. That relief from the fourth section creates no new traffic but merely diverts traffic which is already moving from one railroad or one part of the country to another. It cannot affect the prosperity of the country as a whole. The claim that failure to grant liberal relief has prostrated manufacturing in the interior of the country at the expense of the seaboard is not supported by the census figures. On the contrary, they show the reverse.

Seventh. That fourth-section provisions were omitted from the Motor Carrier Act and the proposed water-carrier bill because it was felt that there was no need for such provisions in the case of those forms of transportation. If need is shown, they should be included. It still does not appear that there is any need in the case of the water carriers. There may be need in the case of the motor carriers, but the situation with respect to their rates is still very confused, and it is not yet possible to state with certainty that such need exists.

Eighth. That the present fourth section should be changed by the elimination of the so-called equidistant clause, which is an unnecessary nuisance, but should not otherwise be changed, with the possible addition of a time limit such as applies in suspension cases. It is highly desirable, however, that the water carriers should be brought under the same degree of regulation as is now provided in the case of the railroads and the motor carriers, not only for the good of the latter but for the good of the water carriers themselves.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address I gave on February 12.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

FARM TENANCY (H. DOC. NO. 149)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Special Committee on Farm Tenancy.

The facts presented in this report reveal a grave problem of great magnitude and complexity. The American dream of the family-size farm, owned by the family which operates it, has become more and more remote. The agricultural ladder, on which an energetic young man might ascend from hired man to tenant to independent owner, is no longer serving its purpose.

Half a century ago 1 of every 4 farmers was a tenant. Today 2 of every 5 are tenants, and on some of our best farm lands 7 of every 10 farmers are tenants. All told, they operate land and buildings valued at $11,000,000,000.

For the past 10 years the number of new tenants every year has been about 40,000. Many tenants change farms every 2 or 3 years, and apparently 1 out of 3 changes farms every year. The agricultural ladder for these American citizens has become a treadmill.

At the same time owners of family-size farms have been slipping down. Thousands of farmers commonly considered owners are as insecure as tenants. The farm owner-operator's equity in his property is, on the average, 42 percent, and in some of our best farming sections is as little as one-fifth.

When fully half the total farm population of the United States no longer can feel secure, when millions of our people have lost their roots in the soil, action to provide security is imperative, and will be generally approved.

A problem of such magnitude is not solved overnight, nor by any one limited approach, nor by the Federal Government alone. While aggravated by the depression, the tenancy problem is the accumulated result of generations of unthinking exploitation of our agricultural resources, both land and people. We can no longer postpone action. We must begin at once with such resources of manpower, money, and experience as are available, and with such methods as will call forth the cooperative effort of local, State, and Federal agencies of government, and of landlords quite as much as tenants. In dealing with the problem of relief among rural people during the depression we have already accumulated information and experience which will be of great value in the long-time program. It will be wise to start the permanent program on a scale commensurate with our resources and experience, with the purpose of later expanding the program to a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the problem as rapidly as our experience and resources will permit.

The Special Committee on Farm Tenancy emphasizes the necessity for action of at least four types: First, action to open the doors of ownership to tenants who now have the requisite ability and experience, but who can become owners only with the assistance of liberal credit, on long terms, and technical advice; second, modest loans, with the necessary guidance and education to prevent small owners from slipping into tenancy, and to help the masses of tenants, croppers, and farm laborers at the very bottom of the agricultural ladder increase their standards of living, achieve greater security, and begin the upward climb toward land ownership; third, the retirement by public agencies of land proved to be unsuited for farming, and assistance to the families living thereon in finding homes on good land; fourth, cooperation with State and local agencies of government to improve the general leasing system. These activities which bear such close relation to each other should furnish a sound basis for the beginning of a program for improving the present intolerable condition of the lowest income farm families.

The committee has very properly emphasized the importance of health and education in any long-time program for correcting the evils from which this large section of our population suffers. Attention is also called to the part which land speculation has played in bringing insecurity into the lives of rural families and to the necessity for eliminitiating sharp fluctuations in land value due to speculative activity in farm lands.

The attack on the problem of farm tenancy and farm security is a logical continuation of the agricultural program this administration has been developing since March 4, 1933. Necessarily, whatever program the Congress devises will have to be closely integrated with existing activities for maintaining farm income and for conserving and improving our agricultural resources.

Obviously, action by the States alone and independently cannot cure the widespread ill. A Nation-wide program under Federal leadership and with the assistance of States, counties, communities, and individuals is the only solution. Most Americans believe that our form of government does not prohibit action on behalf of those who need help.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 16, 1937.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of the bill H. R. 4720 the time for general debate be divided equally, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the other half by myself, and that general debate continue throughout the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4720, and pending the motion asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the bill be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and that general debate continue throughout the remainder of the day. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I do not understand that that ends general debate today.

Mr. LUDLOW. It does not end general debate today. We will continue general debate tomorrow at least for part of the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4720, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP].

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, of course it is a pleasure for me to come before you; it always is; but it seems to me that today it is a greater pleasure than ever before, and perhaps that is because the real nature of my subject is of the greatest importance to this Congress and the Nation in general, and that inspires me with greater zeal. I was especially interested in the message of President Roosevelt read to the House a few moments ago pertaining to farm tenancy, because that is such a serious problem in my community, and also because of the fact that I have just introduced a bill in this Congress which I believe will go far to relieve that situation, and for the further reason that I have had years of experience in farming, and also have been associated more or less with the Federal land bank of the eighth Federal land bank district since its inception in 1913. Another thing has occurred to me. They have accused us in Congress of being rubber stamps. I can never understand that I am a rubber stamp simply because our great Executive suggests the things in which I believe, or because of the fact that our minds run along the same democratic lines. That is no evidence that we are rubber stamps.

I am pleased to come before the House this afternoon to introduce to you Uncle Sam's hospital chart, statistics of Uncle Sam that are based on history and definite facts. Prompted, my friends, by the motive that by study of the past you shall know the future—give us the truth and the truth shall make us free, for knowledge is light and wisdom is power—I have brought to you a chart of Uncle Sam showing the different chills and fevers and collapses that he has had since he was born, and then eventually I hope to be able to bring to you that which I consider the remedy, based on fundamental facts, believing as I do that in a thorough understanding of the cause we can better effect the cure, and on this fundamental basis build a plan for procedure. I know that you will be interested in this because we are the guardians of our old Uncle Sam, of his welfare and good health, and we are the custodians of liberty and justice and righteousness, the only atmosphere in which our Uncle Sam can have a happy life. I am prompted by a few other motives to come before you this afternoon, and primarily, perhaps, because certain statements are paramount in my memory. I remember a statement made by President Roosevelt a few years ago, when he said that we must have a dollar of uniform debt-paying and purchasing power, and I remember when I heard that statement I shouted back, "Amen; glory, yes"; for with such a dollar we can have no more depressions, and without such a dollar we can have no lasting prosperity. Then I remember also President Roosevelt spoke recently in words to the effect that this is no time to put the unemployment problem in the filing case of unfinished business because of Uncle Sam's returning prosperity. I remember also that some years ago a great statesman said something along this line, "That the price of liberty is eternal vigilance."

There is still another reason why I am prompted to come before you this afternoon, and it is this: In and out of Congress, wherever we go—yes; on the streetcar, every few days we hear expressions to the effect that we are out of the depression now, that we are all right, and that we can go ahead, that it is all over. I do not want to cast any gloom or spread any crepe unnecessarily, nor do I wish that we should labor under delusions or false ideas respecting prosperity. I want to say to you and prove it to you by Uncle Sam's health chart that Uncle Sam never gets over a depression. We may forget it, that is all. Then on the ashes of the glorious prosperity that once was, but is no more, out of the tears of widows and orphans, forgetting the starvation, deprivation, misery, want, bread lines, and soup kitchens, we brush away the ashes and we build a new prosperity. I say Uncle Sam never gets over his depression. He never comes out as strong as he was before.

These little blocks of communism, radicalism, and so forth, that we hear so much about are but as little pimples on the body politic that denote the evidence of a nation in decay unless something is done to sustain it. So I say, in the numerous collapses that Uncle Sam has had, over 20 of them, my friends, he never came out perfectly strong again. Cause and effect are what I want to call attention to this afternoon.

When I say that Uncle Sam never comes back as complete as he was before, I am reminded of a little historical sidelight. It was in the Battle of Austerlitz, where Napoleon's army won a skeleton of a victory at an enormous cost. His army had become almost annihilated, and in order to bring them back and restore the morale of his soldiers, Napoleon dressed them in brand new uniforms of red and purple, with shining helmets and glittering sabers, and then he sent one of his great generals to talk to them, to inspire them, and to bring back the morale of the French Army. The great general spoke in glowing terms, praising the soldiers for their valor, and said, "Behold again the Army of France, the army invincible. Yes; the cost was great, but think how soon we got over it—how soon we came back." There was confusion among the crowd that had gathered to hear the great general speak. A little mother emerged from the crowd, came up to the great general, and said, "O master, I hold in my arms our infant child. Its guardian and protector, my husband, and my two sons lie dead on yonder battlefield. You said, O master, that we had gotten over it. Will this, our child, get over it, who has lost her protector? Will I get over it? You said, O master, that we have all come back. When will they come back, my husband and my sons, from yonder battlefield?"

So, my friends, Uncle Sam never comes back as good as he was before. We cover the great black mantle of time over hundreds of thousands of little lonesome graves in the Nation's cemeteries, and under that mantle we hide our memories, and we choke and smother the murmurings and sufferings of humanity. Then on this black mantle we build once more another prosperity, as the chart will show, that lasts on an average only about 7 years. That is all. I have often thought that over all these little lonesome graves the Nation should erect a monument and the kind of inscription it should have is this: "Another one of the victims of Uncle Sam's depression. Died at a premature age, through no fault of his, but because a great Nation fumbled, because a great Nation forgot the fundamental principles for which it was created, because a great Nation forgot the very spirit that gave it birth, which was the protection of the worthy weak against the greedy strong."

No, my friends, we never get over it. Uncle Sam never gets over it. They predicted years ago that the life of Uncle Sam would not be more than 200 years, that unless we cured the cause for these depressions and these collapses Uncle Sam could not endure. As I said before, I do not like to hang crepe or bring any gloom upon my audience, but knowledge is light and wisdom is power.

In introducing Uncle Sam's hospital chart, the main thing is that you may see the red line running back and forth. That designates when Uncle Sam was strong. So you may see when he was strong and then lapsed into anemia. He lapsed into a lack of money which is the lifeblood of trade and commerce.

It has been customary to talk of Uncle Sam as an old man. You know, I rather like this personal reference. There is a human touch about it that is appealing. It makes you feel as though you just loved the old man, our old Uncle Sam.

There is another thing that has been customary for a good many years and that is to talk of money as the lifeblood of trade and industry and the lifeblood in the veins and arteries of Uncle Sam. So I have found it convenient in my little talks on Uncle Sam's hospital chart to use these comparisons. They are so similar. So, if I may, I shall mention the similarity. In the lifeblood of man are three constituents or ingredients, just as there are in Uncle Sam's monetary lifeblood, and I have likened them in this manner: The red blood cells of human blood are similar to the gold in Uncle Sam's monetary system; the white blood cells are similar to the silver; and the hemoglobin, or the serum, the liquid, wherein flows the red and the white blood cells is like unto the paper money wherein flows the gold and the silver in the monetary operations of our Uncle Sam. So I shall use this occasionally if the opportunity presents itself, and there is nothing more important before the House, that I may now and then talk about past statistics and deal with our Uncle Sam, showing why he was glorious and why he has been ill; in other words, to diagnose the case of Uncle Sam.

Mr. Chairman, I have always felt that the most important thing is diagnosis. For this reason I would spend days, weeks, months, even years, to be sure the diagnosis is right. Then I would prescribe the remedy. Ah, if you want to experiment, experiment a little with remedies, but not with diagnoses. Go back and find the cause and effect, then proceed. But before we diagnose the case of Uncle Sam, I should like to stop for just a moment to take an inventory of ourselves, if you please, to see if we are capable of diagnosing, and if we understand how to diagnose, the case of Uncle Sam.

If you remember, when we were kids the school teacher said: "Come up and sit down here on the front bench, Johnnie, Willie, Mary. We are going to take up a very important subject this morning. We are going to take up in arithmetic that most important thing, measurement."

Then, if you remember, she told us how important measurement was, how United States Ambassador to Great Britain, Albert Gallatin, had sent over to the United States a weight that constituted a troy pound; that it was so important that John Quincy Adams, at that time President of the United States, left Washington, went to Philadelphia to receive it, and together with other men carried it to Washington, and in the presence of many broke the seal of the package and placed it in the vault of the United States Bureau of Standards, Weights, and Measures. You will remember how she told us that later on we had a great convention at which the length of the yard and the kilometer were determined, and so on, and how each one of the nations was furnished a kilometer with which to determine length, and so on. She told us all about this. Do you remember, she took out a foot ruler and she said: "Here is 12 inches, a foot, which is used to measure the lumber for building your homes, to measure your land? Here is a yardstick that is used for measuring broadcloth, and so on."

She touched all those things down along the line, but she stopped at the critical point; she failed to say one thing, and humanity has suffered because she forgot it—she did not hold out a dollar and say, "Here is a dollar, the measure of value, most important measure of all—a dollar that measures the sweat of the brow of man."

The dollar, Mr. Chairman, is more important than all the rest because, when every commodity has been measured by its own measure, it is then measured by a dollar, by money, the measure of value. You used this measure of value first in your life when as a child you bought your first stick of candy; and then you continued to use it every day of your life, from morning until night, no matter what business you were in or if you were in any business, until the doctor and the undertaker were paid at the other end of life; and like children in darkness we have groped, trying to find the way, because we did not understand how money measures value.

The dollar measures value and determines, Mr. Chairman, what is so important for each laboring man—the value of his span of life by the day, the week, the month, or the year. The dollar is so important that it measures the value of the lives of the laboring men to their employers, and yet our teacher never told us how it was that a dollar measured value. Like children, we have been groping in darkness, trying to find our way, because we did not know, we did not understand, how it was that a dollar measured value.

Mr. Chairman, I have always believed there were two reasons why we have money panics and depressions—and we have these frequently, as the chart discloses. There are two reasons. The first reason is because we do not understand our own monetary system, and the second reason is because the other fellow does understand it. And there is an infallible law, an indisputable law, that knowledge is light and wisdom is power. Those who know have ever made slaves and serfs of those who do not know. A little personal touch—I want, if you please, to bring out the point that knowledge is light and wisdom is power. I remember sometime ago my little granddaughter came in and crawled up on my knee. She threw a magazine upon the desk and she said, "Tell me about this picture", and she opened the book to a picture in Matamoros down in Mexico, and it showed a big-horned ox hitched to a water wagon selling water on the street. A boy was leading the ox on the streets of Matamoros. I told her about my travels in Mexico and about the general condition of things down there; and she said, "Does that ox like to haul the water wagon around?" I said, "No, honey; that is hard work and the ox does not like it." She said, "But that ox is much stronger than the little boy." I said, "Oh, yes; hundreds of times stronger." You know, I wonder at times how children can ask these questions. She said, "If that ox is hundreds of times stronger than the little boy and does not like to haul that wagon around, how can the little boy make him do it?" I answered in this vein, and I believe it is true: "It is because, honey, the ox does not know its strength and because its spirit has been broken. It is because it has become reconciled to slavery. It does not understand."

Mr. Chairman, there is that same infallible law that knowledge is light and wisdom is power, and those who know have always made slaves out of those who do not know.

The child then took the book and found another picture, taken over in Shanghai, China. There were hundreds of coolies running around with two-wheeled carts, taking the rich people for a ride. I told her about that, and she said again, "Do the coolies like to run around with these two-wheeled carts?" I said, "No; that is hard work. Don't you see they are almost naked?" I told her that the average life of a coolie is 32 years, because they have to run so fast with these carts and work so hard. She said, "Why don't they do like we children do? Why are there so few of the rich and so many of the coolies? Why don't they change off and the rich take the coolies for a ride once in a while?" I answered in the same philosophy: "Why? Because the coolies, though there are many, do not understand their strength. They have been reconciled to misery, want, poverty, and deprivation, and they have grown to believe that is their destiny."

Mr. Chairman, there is that infallible law that knowledge is light and wisdom is power. Those who know and understand have always made slaves and serfs out of those who do not know and who do not understand. It is in that spirit I have brought before you Uncle Sam's hospital chart. Study the past and you shall know the future. A few weeks ago a neighbor came over to my house on a Sunday morning and said, "I see an article in a magazine, but I do not believe it. I want you to read it. It says that 4 percent of the people of the United States take 80 percent of the profits of agriculture and industry, and that the remaining 96 percent must divide the remaining 20 percent." He stated, "I do not believe that." I said, "My friend, that is statistically true." He said, "How in the world can the American people stand that? How can it be that we go on and on under those conditions?" I answered again in the same philosophy, "Because, my friend, the great masses of labor, the great producers of all wealth, do not understand, and there is that infallible law. They think it is their duty."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BINDERUP. I told him, "It is because labor does not understand. They do not realize that they are the creators of all wealth, and they should have an equal right to enjoyment. It is because labor has become reconciled to misery, want, starvation, deprivation, soup kitchens, and bread lines, when in reality they have the superior right above everyone else." It is because of that same principle that knowledge is light and wisdom is power, and the fact that those who do not know and do not understand have ever been slaves to those who know and understand.

So, Mr. Chairman, in order to bring this most important subject to the attention of Congress, and on behalf of our own Uncle Sam, I say, "Study the past and know the future. Turn on the light, and the light shall make us free."

How is it, then, and why is it that every few years—the chart will show every 7 years—we fall once more to the level of deprivation and want; then we begin to build a new prosperity on the ashes of the past for just a few years.

That is what I wanted to show you, and that is why I brought to you this chart. And I hope to have the opportunity of appearing before you for just a few minutes from time to time to explain the chart and to discuss with you this the primary question that has to do with the welfare, the permanent prosperity, and happiness of our people.

CASE—AFFLICTED WITH PERIODICAL PERNICIOUS MONETARY ANEMIA (MONEY IS THE LIFEBLOOD OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY)

1781. Young and healthy, wonderful constitution, body developing, heart strong.

1782. Growing rapidly. Veins and arteries (trade and industry) developing.

1783. Ambitious, courageous, but an unwelcome child among kings and monarchs.

1784. Constitution developing, future promising, mind active, body growing strong.

1785. Fever, insufficient lifeblood (money) for a fast-growing body.

1786. Anemia, pale, palpitation of the heart.

1787. Anemia, heart weak, pulse rapid.

1788. Anemia, growing serious.

1789. Anemia, blood constituents low. Red cells (gold), 146,000; normal, 5,000,000 C. M. White cells (silver), 3,000; normal, 8,500 C. M. Hemoglobin (paper money), low. Patient collapses.

1790. Anemia condition somewhat relieved. Blood regeneration evident.

1791. Anemic condition responding to artificial treatment.
1792. Anemia still evident, daily gains encouraging.
1793. Blood constituents almost normal.
1794. Condition good.
1795. Condition good.
1796. Condition good.
1797. Anemia, slight.
1798. Anemic condition, palpitation of the heart, fever, pale, chills, despondent.
1799. Anemia responds to artificial treatment. Still restless.
1800. Anemia improving. Blood count cells 75 percent normal.
1801. Resting quietly, color good, appetite fair.
1802. Gaining weight, blood cells improving.
1803. Anemia growing worse, nervous, frightened, panicky, sleeplessness, tired, weak.
1804. Anemia better, responding to artificial stimulants, fever slight.
1805. Anemia, but improving; red blood cells low but improving.
1806. Still improving; blood almost normal.
1807. Condition good.
1808. Anemia returning; slight fever, chills, fatigued.
1809. Anemia serious; red blood cells count 60 percent; white, 89 percent; hemoglobin bad.
1810. Anemia responds to artificial stimulants; much improved.
1811. Condition good.
1812. Condition good.
1813. Feeling fine.
1814. Anemic condition again returning; pale; blood constituents deficient.
1815. Anemia responds to artificial stimulants; patient resting.
1816. Heart action stronger; blood counts, red, 85 percent; white, 90 percent.
1817. Condition good.
1818. Anemic condition symptoms indicate return; pale and weak.
1819. Anemia, violent attack; increased pulse; heart weak; blood count, red, 55 percent.
1820. Anemic condition continues; somewhat improved.
1821. Anemia slowly responds to artificial stimulants.
1822. Condition good.
1823. Condition good.
1824. Condition good.
1825. Anemia; patient collapses; bedfast; fever; pulse fast but weak; deficient blood.
1826. Recovery rapid; regains confidence; banishes fear.
1827. Condition good.
1828. Anemia slightly threatening; fear and loss of confidence prevails.
1829. Anemic condition improves; quiet restored; resting.
1830. Condition good.
1831. Condition good.
1832. Condition good.
1833. Anemia symptoms apparent; patient restless, frightened, pale, weak.
1834. Anemic condition improving; red blood cells, 65 percent; white, 85 percent.
1835. Condition good.
1836. Anemia; relapse; heart beat and pulse rapid; fever 101°.
1837. Anemia; patient collapses; red blood cells (gold) low, only 5 percent normal. White cells (silver) low, only 9 percent normal. Hemoglobin (paper money) weak and uncertain.
1838. Anemia continues in violent form; blood pressure low; systolic pressure.
1839. Anemia still violent; great anxiety; spleen and liver enlarged; pale, weak.
1840. Anemia finally responds to artificial stimulants.
1841. Anemia, slight trace left.
1842. Anemia improving.
1843. Condition good.
1844. Condition good.
1845. Condition good.
1846. Condition good.
1847. Anemia; patient collapses; blood deficient; red cells (gold) 12 percent normal; white cells (silver) only 17 percent normal; hemoglobin (paper money) weak and pale.
1848. Anemia slightly improved; red blood cells (gold) 33 percent; white (silver) 35 percent.
1949. Anemia condition improved; red blood cells 63 percent (gold); white 80 percent (silver).
1850. Condition good.
1851. Condition good.
1852. Condition good.
1853. Condition good.
1854. Condition good.
1855. Condition good.
1856. Condition good.
1857. Violent attack; patient collapses; red (gold) blood count down 146,000, normal 5,000,000; white (silver) 1,000, normal 18,500; hemoglobin low.
1858. Anemia responding to artificial stimulants.
1859. Anemia, recovering rapidly.
1860. Anemia, relapse; artificial stimulants fail; heart weak; pulse rapid; nervous.
1861. Anemia, alarming; red blood cells (gold), white blood cells (silver) disappearing.
1862. Anemia responds to real healthy blood transfusion (greenbacks).
1863. Condition good.
1864. Condition good.
1865. Condition good.
1866. Condition good.
1867. Condition good.
1868. Anemia alarming, red and white blood cells coagulated; hemoglobin insufficient.
1869. Anemia alarming, red blood cells (gold), white blood cells (silver) coagulate; hemoglobin (paper money—greenbacks) disappearing; condition critical; patient unconscious—historical black Friday; business paralyzed. J. Gould and Fisk buy up and corner the Nation's gold supply.
1870. Anemia continues, but relieved by artificial stimulants.
1871. Condition good.
1872. Condition good.
1873. Anemia; patient collapses; blood count low; red (gold) 14 percent normal; white cells (silver) almost extinct; hemoglobin (paper money) growing stronger.
1874. Anemia continues; patient bedfast, weak; heart rapid, pulse weak and fast.
1875. Anemia again responds to artificial stimulants (bankers credit money).
1876. Condition good.
1877. Condition good.
1878. Anemia violent but of short duration; white blood cells still almost extinct.
1879. Anemic condition relieved; artificial stimulants (more bankers credit money).
1880. Condition good.
1881. Condition good.
1882. Condition good.
1883. Anemia again threatens; patient panicky, worried, frightened; weak and pale.
1884. Anemia violent; white blood cells (silver) increase; red blood cells (gold) decrease; hemoglobin inadequate.
1885. Anemic condition relieved by artificial stimulants.
1886. Condition good.
1887. Condition good.
1888. Condition good.
1889. Anemia; patient panicky, frightened; red blood cells (gold) disappears (gold shipped to Europe).
1890. Anemia, pernicious; patient collapses; losing weight rapidly; heart very weak.
1891. Anemic condition relieved by artificial stimulants.
1892. Condition improved considerably.
1893. Anemia; panicky; depressed, energy lost; despondent.
1894. Anemia; patient collapses; blood count low, red cells (gold) 10 percent normal; white cells (silver) very low, almost disappeared; hemoglobin (paper money) stronger.
1895. Anemic; losing strength; appetite very poor; palpitation of the heart.
1896. Anemia again responding to faith cure and artificial stimulants.
1897. Condition good.
1898. Condition good.
1899. Condition good.
1900. Condition good.
1901. Condition good.
1902. Condition good.
1903. Anemic condition threatening but not serious.
1904. Condition good.
1905. Condition good.
1906. Condition good.
1907. Anemia; patient collapses, violent form; blood constituents disappear entirely for 30 days; exists entirely on blood substitutes (scrip money).
1908. Anemia relieved by phantom money (bankers credit figures on the book).
1909. Condition good.
1910. Condition good.
1911. Condition good.
1912. Condition good.
1913. Anemic condition; frightened; panicky; increased pulse; heart weak.
1914. Anemia, sudden attack; blood constituents disappearing; panicky; frightened.
1915. Anemia responding to artificial stimulants (bankers credit book money).
1916. Condition good.
1917. Condition good.
1918. Condition good.
1919. Condition good.
1920. Anemia; fatigue; dizziness; despondent; weak and pale.
1921. Anemia; patient collapses; blood constituents recede to the lowest point; heart weak; parts of patient's body almost bloodless; artificial stimulants used to the limit.
1922. Anemia; patient very sick; recovery very slow; artificial stimulants not effective.
1923. Anemia continues; heart weak; vitality at its lowest; still bedfast.
1924. Anemic condition becoming more distressing; heart action continues poor.
1925. Anemic condition remains about the same; blood condition bad; action poor.
1926. Anemic condition unrelieved except for some artificial stimulants.
1927. Anemia; numerous remedies prescribed; magic faith cure; patient weaker.
1928. Anemia; Dr. Coué's plan of faith cure tried out by saying, "Every day in every way I am getting better and better."

1929. Anemia; a violent set-back; red blood cells (gold) coagulated; white blood cells very deficient; condition very discouraging; hemoglobin low.
1930. Anemia; patient collapses; every remedy failing; appetite gone; very sick.
1931. Anemia continues; heart growing weaker; pulse very weak but very rapid.
1932. Anemia pernicious; in its worse form; patient unconscious most of the time.
1933. Anemia; new doctor; red blood cells (gold) transfusion; white blood cells (silver) transfusion; hemoglobin (bankers' Federal Reserve currency) slowly increasing; unreliable, but it helps for the present.
1934. Anemic condition much improved; color returning; appetite better.
1935. Anemic condition still improving; new doctor seems to understand.
1936. Anemic condition improved but still serious.
1937. Anemic condition improved principally by an injection of more artificial stimulants (Federal Reserve currency), which is not so reliable, as it can disappear at any time and leave the patient in more serious condition.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the reason that the electric service has not been brought to the farmers and rural home owners is because the farm and rural service has been left to be developed and extended by the private electric companies. And there is a reason why the private electric companies have never served the farm and rural population. And this is the same reason why private electric companies cannot now carry electricity to farmers and why they never can serve the rural home owners.

A PROBLEM OF COSTS

Carrying electricity to all the farmers is a problem of cost and charges, a problem of low and reasonable costs, a problem of bringing down the cost of electricity to within the reach and ability of the farmers to pay.

Farmers as a class of people in industry are compelled to rely upon low and uncertain income for the payment of their regular monthly bills. For this reason the first requirement for a farm and rural electric program is low and reasonable charges for service.

Any program to carry electricity to all the farmers without this indispensable requirement of low costs and reasonable charges will prove a vain and fruitless gesture, a humiliation, disappointment, and failure. The farmers would be left to discontinue the service and give up the pleasure and blessings of electricity.

It is true that private electric companies have in certain parts of the country served a special few of the farmers, those least costly and profitable to be served. But even these farmers have been served only at high and excessive charges, and by farmers taking less electricity than necessary to be of substantial use to them.

This partial service and limited use is not the demand now to be met, is not the service being considered, or the rural electrical program now being framed to be carried out.

THE PROGRAM MUST BE FOR ALL THE FARMERS

The farm or rural electric program today is a program to carry electricity to all the farmers, to the isolated farmers, and rural home owners, as well as to the more densely populated areas, the same as the rural mails and parcel post, and a sufficient amount of electricity for substantial use in farm operation.

To understand properly the reason, the cause, for the high private electric company charges which has made the cost prohibitive to farmers it must first be realized and understood that the stock of the local operating companies is owned, held, manipulated, and controlled by certain foreign electric companies commonly known as holding companies.

FOREIGN ELECTRIC HOLDING COMPANIES

These foreign electric holding companies holding the stock of the local electric companies neither generate, transmit, nor distribute electricity, nor perform any useful service in producing electricity or carrying or distributing electricity to the farmers. But they compel the local operating companies generating and distributing electricity to levy a tribute upon their consumers in the form of increased rates and charges and make their collection from the people.

The reason why private electric companies left to develop and distribute electric service have never served the farmers and rural home owners except the cream, a certain special few, and these few farmers and rural home owners at high and excessive charges for current, is plain, open, and simple of understanding, and the cause can never be overcome.

HIGH SALARIES MAKE HIGH COSTS

One reason is because local private companies are compelled to add to the charges for service to pay high and excessive salaries to many electric holding-company officials, sometimes amounting to over $300,000 each annually, and to collect these amounts from the consumers as a part of the cost for the service.

HIGH DIVIDENDS ON WATERED STOCK

Another reason for high electric charges by the private local companies is because the local operating companies are compelled to add to their charges to pay dividends on watered and overvalued stock, all of which is added to the costs and collected from the consumers of electricity.

8½ PERCENT COMPOUND INTEREST

Another reason for high private-company charges is that the overhead holding companies, as one of their sources of high income, compel the local operating companies to borrow money from the holding companies at as high as 8½-percent interest compounded semiannually, commonly called "milking" the local companies.

The summary Federal Trade Commission report, authorized in 1928 under President Coolidge and reporting in 1934 under President Roosevelt, shows that to maintain or uphold themselves in these and other charges, before the public these foreign electric holding companies are expending many millions of dollars annually and charging the amount up to the consumers in increased cost of the service.

THIRTY MILLIONS FOR FAVORABLE PUBLICITY

This report shows that more than $30,000,000 annually has been and is now being expended by the holding companies to pay for their own prepared articles to be published in newspaper editorial columns as reflecting the position and advice of the editors before the readers of the papers.

PROFESSORS, TEACHERS, AND MINISTERS

Further parts of this Federal Trade Report show and recite the evidence in detail that vast sums have been annually expended to increase the salaries and pay of many college professors and teachers as well as civic leaders and ministers of the Gospel who are unwittingly misled to voice the praises of the private electric companies.

ALL CHARGED TO ELECTRIC CONSUMERS

It is further affirmatively shown by this report that all these vast millions of money expended for paid newspaper editorials and for increased salaries and pay of educational, civic, and religious leaders are added to the costs of electricity and collected from the consumers.

FARMERS REFUSED SERVICE FOR 30 YEARS

After refusing for more than 30 years to extend the electric service to the farmers at charges within their ability to pay and leaving them floundering, hopeless, in the mud and darkness of primitive life for want of the comforts and conveniences of electricity, the private electric holding companies now, as soon as the farmers begin organizing to provide their own electric systems to serve themselves, come in and make an eleventh hour offer to furnish electric service to the farmers at a cost for which they have long contended electricity could not be furnished without great loss.

Nothing is more obvious and apparent than that the purpose of this eleventh hour offer is now made to confuse, mislead, and toll away a sufficient number of farmers and rural home owners to cut up, divide, and disorganize the territory, and make the required cooperative membership impossible, defeat the movement of the farmers to serve themselves, after which rates will be restored back to regain lost dividends and profits.

TAKING ADVANTAGE OF FARM TRAITS OF CHARACTER

It has long been a fact known relative to farmers as a class in industry that they will not stand together as other classes of businessmen, in a contest for equal business opportunity, and which results naturally from their isolation and the separate and independent lives they live.

Taking advantage of this trait of character, the independent disposition of the farmers to pursue and assume their own separate course and responsibility, monopolies, profiteering upon the farmers, have always tolled away enough farmers from cooperative and independent movements to prevent a united farm organization and to defeat a cooperative movement among them.

It is this same trait of independence in farmers which is now being capitalized upon by the private electric holding companies and directed through the local private operating companies to frustrate and defeat the farm cooperative movement, being organized to carry electricity to the rural home owners and to prevent the farmers organizing to serve themselves, all to prolong the private electric monopoly upon them.

FARMERS SHOULD BE WISE TO THIS STRATEGY

But farmers should at this day be conscious of and wise to this crafty strategy and maneuver to take advantage of the independent character of the individual farmers and the separate lives they live to divide and thereby defeat this cooperative movement now being organized to combine for equal opportunity to enjoy electric service with other classes.

FARMERS MUST BE LOYAL TO THEIR FELLOW FARMERS', THEIR OWN, AND CHILDREN'S INTEREST

The farmers and rural home owners who are maintaining good faith with their fellow farmers, and who remain loyal to the cooperative movement, will not only assure themselves and their families of the great benefits and blessings of electric service at lowest and most reasonable charges, and within their means and ability to pay, but they will be leaving a priceless heritage of electric service at lowest costs to their children and posterity to come, free from the burdens and impositions of high charges to be held upon them by the holding-company monopoly.

But the farmers and rural home owners who now fail to grasp the opportunity to take advantage of cooperative and ownership operations and the aid the Government is now offering to them to provide electric service at cost and yield to this eleventh-hour tragedy will not only be depriving themselves and their families of the great benefits and blessings of electricity at assured low and reasonable costs but will be leaving their children and posterity to pay tribute to the electric monopoly and the burdens of high rates and charges, excessive and beyond their ability to pay.

PRIVATE EXPRESS COMPANIES AND THE PARCEL POST

Such private electrical companies, while paying high salaries to a vast army of officials, and while paying dividends upon watered and excess-valued stock, and paying compound and extortionate interest rates and subsidizing newspapers at the cost of millions annually, and doubling the pay of a vast army of educators and civic leaders, can no more carry electricity to all the farmers at low and reasonable rates or charges than the private express companies were able to carry parcels and packages to all the farmers and rural home owners and make delivery to them at their doors at low and reasonable charges.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AND COOPERATIVE OPERATIONS

It is only under public ownership or under cooperative operations organized for use and service, without, and free from profit and gain whereby electricity can be carried to all the farmers at low and reasonable rates or charges like the rural mails and parcel post.

Such privately owned electrical companies are not now carrying electricity to all the farmers either anywhere in this country or anywhere in Europe today where electricity is being extended to the rural areas.

THERE IS A REASON WHY

As there is and has been a reason why the private electrical companies have not carried electricity to the farmers, why they cannot now carry electricity to the farmers, why they can never carry electricity to the farmers at low and reasonable costs and charges within their reach and ability to pay, so there is a reason why farm cooperative associations can and do serve all the farmers and rural home owners at low and reasonable rates and charges. It is because such farm cooperative organizations are not compelled to add to their charges and collect from the consumers of electricity to pay high salaries to a vast army of private holding-company officials.

It is because farm cooperative associations are not compelled to add to the charges and collect from the consumers of electricity to pay dividends on watered or excess valued stock, nor to pay dividends to any stockholders nor to make profits for any investors.

It is because farm cooperative companies are not required to add to their charges and collect from the consumers of electricity to pay extortionate compound interest rates nor to pay vast millions for newspaper articles published as editorials in the press to maintain themselves before the public.

It is because farm cooperative companies are not required to add to the costs and collect from the consumers to pay for the increase of salaries of an army of college professors and teachers and civic leaders and ministers of the Gospel misled to sound before the people the praises of private electric service.

FOR USE AND SERVICE AND NOT FOR PROFIT AND GAIN

Such farm cooperative companies are operated under a plan and system for use and service to their members and not to make profits for stockholders and investors and under which should any profits accrue from the service, these profits must be rebated back to the consumers.

The farm cooperative program is being organized to relieve the charges for electric service from the burdens added to the rates to pay high salaries, dividends and extortionate interest and from many extravagant expenditures now levied by the electric holding companies and forced upon the local operating companies to collect.

ELECTRICITY SUFFICIENT FOR SUBSTANTIAL USE

The problem of carrying electricity to the farmers is not to furnish barely enough current or power to light the dwelling and garage, but enough to perform many household tasks, enough to perform many farm duties, enough to be of full and substantial use in the conduct of the everyday affairs of farm life.

To bring such ample and sufficient supply within the reach of all the farmers in such amounts requires that the cost or charges be relieved from all high salaries and dividend demands, from extortionate interest rates, and from loss and waste of duplications and lowered by economy and efficiency of operations.

HIGH COSTS HAVE KEPT ELECTRICITY FROM THE FARMERS

Under private electric companies, the sale of electric service has been too high for farmers to pay, and the charges for line extensions have been extortionate and demanded in cash. And they have made the electric cost prohibitive and the current cost of service beyond the means even for a scant minimum amount of current.

The alert, watchful, painful care observed to turn off the power or light switch before all the power is used or before the full-time light is required, is not to save the cost of electricity but to save from paying more of the excessive charges.

The full goal of rural electrification is not reached by relieving electric charges from high salaries and dividends to stockholders, nor from usurious and extortionate interest charges, nor from costly newspaper propaganda campaigns, nor from increasing the salaries of civic leaders to influence and maintain favorable public opinions.

The full goal of low and reasonable charges is not carried to rural electrical program by relieving the costs of electrical operations from these extravagant holding-company expenditures, all of which will be added to and collected as a part of the costs of electricity from the consumers.

THERE IS STILL ANOTHER REASON

But there is still another reason, still another cause to be removed and overcome to bring the cost of electricity sufficiently low and reasonable and within the reach of all the farmers. There is another evil, grown up under private company operations, the vast extensions of piecemeal distributing lines.

This has further burdened the private company charges with payments for great loss and waste, and the want of economical and efficient operations, all of which must be eliminated under nonprofit cooperative organizations before the farmers can fully come into their own for low and reasonable electric charges.

We must go further than the elimination of extravagant and profligate expenditures. We must scale down to the minimum the loss and waste in operations grown up and extended under private companies in the mad race for profit and gain of different companies in the same area or territory.

ALL ELECTRICAL CONSUMERS MUST BE SERVED TOGETHER

The farmers and rural home owners cannot be served separately and apart from the town, city, and other consumers in the same territory, area, or district and low and reasonable charges made to them no more than the parcel post or mail service could be carried on by different systems operated in the same territory serving different patrons.

It is only by a unified postal system serving all the patrons of a district and territory, the town, city, and rural people as well, that a letter is carried many hundreds of miles and then delivered to the patron's door for the low and trivial sum of 3 cents.

This is even more and especially true in the operations of the electrical service which cannot be carried on at low and reasonable rates under limited or small volume production.

The generation, transmission, and distribution of electricity must be in large mass or volume to bring down the unit cost and charges of all the different parts of the service carried on under one system, which includes all the service to all the people.

There is no royal road or highway of carrying electricity to all the farmers. The rural program now in the course of development includes throwing off and relief from the burdens of high and excessive salaries from all dividends, profits, and gains, from the many extravagant expenditures of private holding company operations. All of which are added to the charges and collected from the consumer.

And the farm cooperative electric program development includes even more than throwing off and relief from these extravagant expenditures for profit and gain, from the inefficiency and waste in operations resulting from piecemeal line extensions, and from duplication and overlapping of service.

There is a remedy for this duplication and overlapping of service, this piecemeal extension of distributing lines, this operation of separate and different systems of generating plants, transmission and distributing lines, and the different and separate service provided for town, city, and rural communities within one territory, area, or district.

It is the organization of the county or electrical district under one unified or coordinated system for the generation of electric power or current for the whole territory or all of the consumers for such district which is necessary to lower the power-unit cost by increasing the volume of electricity produced and distributed and by combining town, city, and rural territories under one central power plant and system for all.

The entire territory of the county unit or electrical district, the whole of farm, urban, and city population, and all individual consumers and industries to be served within the specified territory included must be held for the exclusive market and consumption of such unified system and coordinated facilities to bring the cost of electricity within the reach of all the farmers.

Under the county unit or electrical district all existing plants would be coordinated or organized under one unified electrical system for the elimination of loss and waste resulting from duplication and overlapping of service necessary for economy and efficient operations.

Or the cooperative associations and municipalities may acquire and take over the existing electrical means or facilities under the laws of the State where located for the unification or coordination of such plants under one system of operation and management.

Or, if there is a municipally owned plant within the county, territory, or electrical district without sufficient generating capacity to produce electric current or power for all the individual consumers and industries included in such county unit or electrical district, then the municipality owning such plant may apply to the Rural Electrification Administration for a loan to enlarge such municipal plant sufficient to provide their farm electric membership association with such increased power or current required in addition to the normal amount used by the city consumers.

RELIEF TO FARMERS' WIVES

Under such low and reasonable rates affording a full and liberal use of electricity at low and reasonable costs per family, the farmer's wife can be relieved of the burdens of many irksome tasks and drudgeries which she is compelled to perform in her daily routine life.

Farmers' wives can be relieved of the work of washing clothes, a strenuous weekly task; of sweeping and washing dishes, of churning and mixing butter, of pumping and carrying water, of cleaning and caring for oil lamps, and many other burdens from day to day.

The farmers' wives could be given a respite from the constant labors and drudgeries which take away the strength and vigor of young womanhood, prematurely in life, and bring on gray hairs and wrinkles and broken and impaired health long before their time.

And more than the relief of lifting burdens, the farmers' wives can enjoy light in every room and hall in the house as well as in every dark closet and pantry, a hot smoothing iron without a heated room, a cooling fan to moderate the weather, and hot water for use at all times.

The farmers' wives could enjoy the same rest and leisure of women of towns, cities, and other classes, with some time for pleasure and recreation and attention and care of the body as required, and time to employ and cultivate the mind.

RELIEF FROM FARM BURDENS

And the farmers could be relieved of the toil of the constant pumping of water for stock, of the sawing of wood for heating, of shelling corn and cleaning grain, of grinding feed from week to week, of cutting hay, straw, and fodder, and many other farm duties required, which are now performed by hand and by bodily strength.

And all this work could be performed by turning a switch and starting electric power, and as quickly turned off again without the loss incident to starting and stopping, and more costly to operate when using.

ALL POWER COMES IN OVER ONE SMALL WIRE

And all this mysterious power would come into the farm home buildings over or through one single wire, and stands ready at all times to answer the call for aid and help in many of the different ways the services would be performed.

The additional income from the farm which can be made from the use of electricity can be made more than to pay the cost of the electric service, to say nothing of the comforts and conveniences, pleasures and entertainment brought to the farm home.

WHY GOVERNMENT LOANS AND COOPERATIVE FARM COMPANIES

It was because of this failure of private companies and the burdens of high salaries and excessive charges to pay dividends upon watered, excess-valued stock, and to many duplicating stockholders and their inability to provide electric service to the farmers at low and reasonable rates, and within their means and ability to pay, that laws were enacted authorizing nonprofit cooperative companies to organize for use and service of members without the burdens of profit and gain, and the Government has provided funds at the low interest rate of 3 percent with which to construct farm-distributing lines to carry electricity to all the farmers.

ELEVENTH-HOUR OFFERS TO HELP THE COOPERATIVE MOVEMENT

Now that the farmers are organizing cooperative companies to serve themselves and to assure of low and reasonable rates, the private electric companies are declaring a program of reducing charges. But they will be unable to make and maintain lower or more reasonable rates for electric service to the farmers.

The private local operating companies cannot carry the burdens of high salaries, of dividends on excess-valued stock, and the many extravagant expenditures imposed by the overhead holding companies without adding these charges to the cost of the service to be collected from the farm consumers.

Nor can the private companies carry on the operations under piecemeal extension of lines and overlapping and duplicating service without loss, waste, and inefficiency, and under which loss, reasonable rates are impossible regardless of the efforts made.

PRIVATE COMPANIES HAVE LONG REFUSED TO SERVE THE FARMERS

The private electric companies have long refused to serve the farmers except upon large cash installment payments and high and extortionate rates and charges. Now, they omit the high cash payment required and reduce the rates and complain of the cooperative charges being equal to or not less than their reduced rates.

They do not explain that the cooperative rates include not only the cost of electricity but the installment payments for their lines, and that as soon as the lines are paid for, the monthly charge for electricity furnished or provided will be small and trivial in amount as compared with the private company rates even when reduced.

The private company charges for electricity have been more than the combined cooperative payments, including both for electricity and payment for the lines. And when the farmers of today, under cooperatives, complete these payments for their lines, they can turn them over to their children to enjoy electricity at low or negligible cost.

THE ONE REASON WHY FARMERS NOT SERVED

The only reason why farmers and their wives have not been relieved of these burdensome tasks, of these continuous drudgeries within the line of conveniences which have come to the homes in towns and cities, has been because the private electric companies left to develop the rural electric service have been unable while carrying the burdens of the private electric holding companies to provide this extension of the electric service at low and reasonable rates and within the ability of the farmers to meet and pay.

And the only reason why farmers and their wives are not relieved of these burdens now and brought all these comforts and conveniences will be because they will not accept the means provided for and offered to them by nonprofit cooperative organizations through the aid of the Government to bring electric service in ample supply at low and reasonable rates and charges free from the burden of excess profit and gain.

And what is more unbelievable even than a failure of farmers to assure themselves of these operating advantages is that farmers who are committed to the cooperative policy and movement in all other producing operations are misled to abandon the plan for electricity.

WHERE TO FIND THE FACTS

The facts of these vast expenditures made by the electric holding companies in their newspaper publicity campaigns and the collection of dividends on watered stock and extortionate compound interest rates, and the millions paid to increase salaries of unsuspecting teachers, civic leaders, and ministers are all shown or disclosed in the exhaustive hearings held before the Federal Trade Commission continuing for more than 6 years under three Presidential administrations, the report of which includes 94 volumes, and certified to by the highest authority in the Federal service of the United States.

Every Member of the House and Senate will be inevitably, in time, called upon to consider further the monopoly of electricity. Everyone is urged to read in advance the summary Federal Trade Commission Report No. 71–A and verify from the testimony taken and reported in these exhaustive hearings. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill for the year 1938. I want to call your attention to the figures in this particular bill in order to show you how rapidly we are increasing from year to year each one of these regular appropriation bills for the particular department involved; and if I am any judge, based on my observation during the past 3 or 4 years, the Members of Congress will be astounded when the last appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year has passed this House.

If we take into consideration the two appropriation measures we have already passed, we find that the first emergency appropriation of this year amounted to $789,000,000. We then passed the independent offices appropriation bill, which in 1936 was $805,000,000 and for 1937, $1,079,000,000. For the year 1938 it was $1,140,000,000, or an increase of $61,250,000 over last year.

We now have the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, which is the second of the regular appropriation measures; and what do we find in this particular bill? The Budget estimate was $1,001,567,449 for the fiscal year 1937. The amount appropriated was $992,524,892; in other words, the Appropriations Committee figured that because the amount was less than the amount asked by the Department, we were doing a great thing; but what happened? Last year we not only made the appropriation, but when we add to the appropriation the deficiencies for these two Departments we appropriated actually $263,530,110 more in 1937 than in 1936. Now, what do we find with respect to this year? We are asked in the Budget $1,515,996,218, and in the bill as it is presented to you you appropriate $1,500,955,151.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield now.

There may be a lot of satisfaction in saying we have cut down the Budget estimate, but the fact of the matter is that instead of cutting down we are increasing the amount of this bill by $234,900,149.

If we add this to the first bill we passed, we find that we have appropriated over a quarter of a billion dollars in these two bills more than we appropriated last year.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield at the present time. I will yield shortly to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Budget estimates are one thing, but what Congress appropriates is another.

This is the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr WOODRUM]. This ought to show the Members of the Congress that their responsibility lies in the appropriations that they make. I would be shocked if one of the departments were to come to the Appropriations Committee and ask for less money than it did the year before.

My observation of the various departments of the Government has been that each year they try to add to their askings in order that they may increase the activities of their departments and by so doing take on additional employees and in this manner have a greater amount of influence because they will have more people to go to the Congressmen and state that they need the money in this particular department for their own purposes and uses.

This is the point I want to bring to the attention of the Members of the House today. You are responsible for the amount of money expended for the operation of the Government. This is your responsibility and it is my responsibility.

I appreciate the fact that with a membership in the House of 435 Members it is the easiest thing in the world to pass the buck and say, "Well, I was in favor of cutting down expenses, but we have so many other Members in the House, they just overrode me." However, if anyone were to observe your particular vote with respect to all the votes that go through the House, he might have an entirely different opinion of you. It would be a wise thing if the votes of Members of Congress were published in the papers of their own districts so their constituents could really see how extravagant they really were.

So you are responsible, not to any one individual but to this Nation for your extravagance.

I can see that from the very rapid expansion of Government departments that we will have larger expenses rather than less expense. The Government has taken on over 100,000 employees in the past 3 years, and is taking on over 100 a day, and something some time is going to crack, and the responsibility for that will be yours.

I can name 10 men in the House of Representatives who are responsible now for this increase in expenditures, and they are responsible for this reason: that they can stop these expansions if they get together and make up their minds to balance the Budget and to have an economic administration rather than an extravagant administration, which this one is—the most expensive and extravagant in the Nation's history.

It is certainly amusing to pick up the newspapers around January and read the headlines. Here is one that says that Mr. Roosevelt will balance the Budget in 1939.

I want to say that if he continues the way he has for the last 3 years he will never balance the Budget, because we are increasing expenditures faster than the people of this country can increase their incomes to increase taxes. We will never increase taxes fast enough to catch up to your extravagant expenditures.

I am going to name the committee of 10 men responsible for this state of affairs. We must put the responsibility somewhere.

The President is first responsible.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives is next in line.

House committee chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

They are then 10 men responsible, and I wish I dared mention their names, but probably if I did they would throw me out of the House of Representatives, because they could do it. [Laughter.]

They can do anything in the House of Representatives that they make up their minds to do. These 10 men could get together and make up their minds and then tell Congress what they intended to do insofar as we are going to increase the expenditures of this Government or to economize in Government expenses.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; not now, I will yield if the gentleman will give me more time. Now, I have here the daily statements of the United States Treasury for January, at least most of them.

The daily statements of the Treasury Department ought to reveal to the membership of the House just where we are headed. You know that at the end of the year you can come in and say that we appropriated $10,000,000,000 and spent seven and a half billion dollars, and we only took in $4,000,000,000, but that is just like pouring water on a duck's back so far as making a statement to this House of Representatives is concerned, because it does not amount to a tinker's darn. It does not mean anything; you Members of the House cannot grasp it, there is nobody in the House who knows what it means, and for that reason I have to give it to you piecemeal, a little more in the line of thought that I can understand, and I think you will all get the same value from the statements that I would. These are the daily statements of the United States Treasury Department, made out by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau.

TREASURY DAILY DEFICITS

On January 4, according to daily receipts and expenditures, we find that we were behind $2,367,040. On January 5 the statement shows a loss of $13,676,790. On January 6 the amount of money taken in from receipts and the difference from what we spent shows a gain of $48,926,899; but get this fact, that we received from public debt that was repaid $101,806,000, and we only paid out $49,000,000; on the public debt we took in $52,728,000 more from money that we had already loaned to these agencies than we received, and if we deduct that we would have a deficit on that day of over $3,000,000. On January 7 we find that the Treasury report shows that we were $12,277,000 in the red. In case some of you might think that I am not giving the facts and figures correctly I want you to read these, and I hand them to you. On January 8 we find that we were $4,366,108 in the red. On January 9 it was $3,549,000 in the red. On January 11—and here comes this man from Texas, Mr. MAVERICK, who wants to know if this is correct—we were $8,452,518.64 in the red; and I want to say here to the gentleman from Texas that Texas is getting more of this money than any other State in the Union.

Mr. MAVERICK. That proves that I am a good Congressman.

Mr. RICH. And if the people of Texas do not stop trying to drain this Treasury something will happen. [Laughter.] On January 12 we were $4,261,542 in the red; on January 13 we were $10,229,000 in the red; on January 14 we were $7,460,000 in the red; and on January 15—well, I have not figured that out. You know, you have to figure these out from daily statements if you want to know the actual amount we are in the red. Well, we were going to show a profit on that day, and, if I did not give this to you, you may think that I am trying to put one over on the Members of the House. It looks to me as if we were going to have $3,000,000 credit for that day, and if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] will figure it out and put it in the RECORD I shall appreciate it. On January 16 we were $15,987,000 in the red; on January 18 we were $64,917,000 in the red; on January 19, $12,185,000 in the red. I want to give some of these statements to the chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]. On January 21 we were $11,395,000 in the red; on January 22, $6,736,000 in the red; on January 23 we were $2,897,000 in the red; January 25, $8,858,000 in the red; January 26, $8,447,000 in the red; January 27, $753,486 in the red—less than a million dollars on that day. Think of it! On January 28 we were $7,271,000 in the red; January 29, $4,260,000 in the red; January 30, $797,510 in the red.

That takes up the month of January. When the month of February is over I shall give you some more data in reference to that particular thing—the daily deficits of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. RICH. First, I shall have to yield to the chairman of the committee, and then I shall yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that I have a great deal of admiration for him and I have much sympathy with his economic state of mind, but I am sure that he does not want to leave a wrong impression as to the economies effected in this bill.

The gentleman said a while ago that the bill shows an increase of $234,900,149 over the 1937 Treasury and Post Office bill, which is quite right, but the gentleman did not say why that increase occurred and I think he ought to go further in saying that it is due to the Social Security Act, and I am sure the gentleman does not want to repeal that act.

Mr. RICH. No; I do not want to repeal section 1, but sections 2 and 3 you will find unconstitutional, and the Supreme Court will repeal those. The fact of the matter is that we have increased the old-age reserve account $250,000,000 over what it was a year ago.

Mr. LUDLOW. No; $235,000,000 over what it was a year ago.

Mr. RICH. That is correct; my mistake, and I want to correct any I may make.

Mr. LUDLOW. We think that we have done a very effective job in cutting down the appropriations for the operations of these two departments. We reduced the Budget estimate $15,041,067, and we reduced aside from this increment of social security which is actuarial and over which we have no control—we reduced the total for those two departments $99,851 below the appropriations of 1937, and I think that ought to be stated in all fairness.

Mr. RICH. I have observed the gentleman from Indiana in this House. The gentleman is always trying to cut down these bills as far as he is concerned, but his colleagues will not help. They are passing laws all the time that require more money and the gentleman does not have the help he should have for economy. I will venture to say that if the gentleman had the opportunity, the bills of this country would not be where they are today, because the gentleman from Indiana can pick out the men on this floor who are interested in keeping them down. He is one of them and I congratulate him. But I want to say that the gentleman from Indiana will admit the reason these bills are increasing every year is because of the fact that Congress passes laws which require more money.

Mr. LUDLOW. Absolutely. The gentleman is correct about that. Congress passes statutes that require appropriations to meet them. Our committee is merely an appropriating committee. We cannot annul statutes passed by Congress by refusing appropriations if we wanted to; so that we carry out the mandates of Congress on these matters. I think, just as the gentleman thinks, that the Congress should hold appropriations down to the very limit, but when Congress enacts laws the Committee on Appropriations cannot disregard them. Even if it should desire to do so, I think no Member feels that we should disregard the Social Security Act.

Mr. RICH. That is the reason I am laying this responsibility on the membership of the House. The membership of the House is responsible.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman should not overlook the membership of another body.

Mr. RICH. The Senate, the House, Republicans, and Democrats alike. I do not except anybody in that statement.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The statement of the gentleman giving the balances for each day is very interesting. I should like to know, if the gentleman has the figures, what is the deficit this year, from July up to this time?

Mr. RICH. I will tell the gentleman in a moment. All the gentleman needs to do is to look at one of these statements and he can find it. The excess of expenditures over receipts for this year from July 1 to January 14 was $1,492,779,275.98.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman means February?

Mr. RICH. No. From July 1 to the date of this statement, January 14, we were $1,492,779,275.98 in the red. The national debt on this date was $34,464,000,000.

I want to make these observations. Talk about this great national debt. Talk about debts owed us by foreign countries. We criticize foreign countries because they do not assume their obligations and pay their debts to Uncle Samuel. I criticize them, too, but I say to you Members of Congress that the United States, as we are working things out now, does not intend to pay its debts. You Members of Congress, the way you are headed—that is, for bankruptcy—do not intend to pay your debts.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. The total amount owed us by Great Britain is $11,000,000,000; by Hungary, $4,693,000,000; by Poland, $435,000,000; by Ethiopia, $33,000,000; Latvia, $13,000,000; Lithuania, $14,000,000; Czechoslovakia, $312,000,000; Rumania, $122,000,000; Belgium, $727,000,000; France, $6,847,000,000; Italy, $2,407,000,000; making over $22,000,000,000 owed by foreign countries. They do not intend to pay those debts. I am confident of it. They have repudiated them already. I am just as sure, the way we are going, the United States will repudiate its debt of $35,000,000,000 which we have now, unless we do one of two things—cut expenses or pay more taxes. I will show you in the next 4 minutes what is going to happen.

This administration is pretty shrewd in fooling the people. This is the way they are doing it. Last year you collected 1 percent from the corporations on the amount paid for this social security on the labor pay roll. This year you are going to collect 2 percent from the manufacturers and 2 percent from the employees, making 4 percent on the total pay roll of all people who work in this country, except those who are eliminated from the Social Security Act—farmers and people employing less than eight people and domestic servants.

That will bring into the Treasury of the United States the greatest sum of money that you ever dreamed of. But it is intended for one purpose, and that is to take care of old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, and so forth. When that money comes into the Treasury you are going to use it to buy Government bonds. You are not going to pay out any great amount until 1942. By that time this fund will have increased so rapidly that we will take up most of the outstanding Government bonds at 3 percent.

When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] was on the floor the other day he turned a complete somersault in his desire to eliminate the issuance of tax-free bonds. I am against them and I feel sure he is, but he says we have passed a law to eliminate them. When he made that statement this went through my mind, and I know he is correct, because he would be here hollering for it if it was not true. Somebody high up in the White House told him, "Now we have this settled"—so far as my own interpretation of what will happen and see if I am not right—"we are going to buy up all these bonds with this social security money and then we will not have any bonds to pay interest on, except what goes into social security fund."

That satisfied the gentleman from Texas, but instead of laying that money by to take care of old age and social security, we are going to steal that money away from them and put it into Government debts, and all we will have to pay for social security will be I O U—I O U in the form of Government bonds; so we will, as I say, misappropriate might be a milder word, but the fact is, we steal this money collected for the purpose of paying old-age pension to pay our national debt. That will put off the debt payment so far as Government debts are concerned, but we fool the people because there will be no funds to pay social security, and we will then retax to pay for social security.

You steal that money and you put it in Government bonds, and the Government bonds will not be worth the paper they are written on, because you will have outstanding more than you can possibly pay off.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RICH. I do not yield right now. I want to finish my statement, and they will not give me any more time. When I get through telling the Democrats that they are going to steal the social-security money to pay this enormous debt you are contracting, my time will have expired. The fact of the matter is, that is what is going to happen. That is one way of fooling the American people. You are collecting this money for social security and old-age pensions but are going to use it to pay off the national debt. A real sales tax collected from manufacturers, who pass it on in cost of goods sold and collected from wages of labor.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RICH. No. I consider it a pretty shrewd thing on the part of the Democratic Party to be able to fool the people into a tax like that.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I told the gentleman I would not yield, because I want to make this statement. If the gentleman will get me more time, I will yield. You will have eliminated the tax-free securities, because you will own them all through this social-security fund. I hope, then, you never issue another one, because the Government should not issue tax-free bonds.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How would the gentleman have the Government invest the money collected for the social-security fund if not in Government bonds? What other security would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman want to know what I think of Government bonds now?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICH. I will tell the gentleman. If you did not have this money coming in more than sufficient to take care of the needs under the Social Security Act, Government bonds would not be worth much now.

Mr. PITZPATRICK. The gentleman knows that is not so.

Mr. RICH. I do not. I mean that; they would not be.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman is not answering my question. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. RICH. I am going to answer it. Except for the money coming in under the tax in the Social Security Act you would never pay the Government debt, because the Democrats would never be able to collect sufficient revenue otherwise. It is a camouflaged sales tax.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Answer my question. Where would the gentleman invest that money if not in Government bonds?

Mr. RICH. I supposed they could go out and buy other good bonds.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Tell us what bonds are better than Government bonds.

Mr. RICH. The national-bank laws say in what securities investment trusts shall be invested.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Tell us what is more secure than Government bonds.

Mr. RICH. There are other bonds just as good, that probably will be a whole lot better—bonds that State and National laws consider legal for trust funds.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No; that is not so.

Mr. RICH. Buy some of these farms the President wants to get rid of, worn-out farms. They will be a whole lot better than Government bonds unless we balance our Budget.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Before the Social Security bill was passed, United States bonds were very high.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to propound two questions?

Mr. RICH. Yes; but I can answer only one question at a time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With reference to the foreign debts owed to us, has any interest or principal been paid on these debts since we established the reciprocal trade agreement policy and began to put these trade agreements into operation?

Mr. RICH. One small country has paid us something like $3,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman recall what country that was?

Mr. RICH. Yes; Finland.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So that with some 12 or 14 agreements in operation only one little country is paying us any part of either principal or interest on prior debts.

Mr. RICH. That is right. The highest rate of interest is 3.3 percent. The lowest is on the Italian debt and amounts to four-tenths percent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not true that the State Department promotes the idea all the time that one of the principal reasons for the reciprocal trade agreement program is that we may be able to collect interest and principal payments from these countries that owe us money?

Mr. RICH. I think the gentleman is right. I think also that it will be found that this policy is going to damn our American labor, farmers, and manufacturers. I believe American farmers should produce as much of the need for domestic foodstuffs as possible. I believe also that American manufacturers should produce manufactured articles to meet the domestic market rather than to let these articles be imported from foreign countries, where they are produced with cheap labor. That cheap labor displaces better-paid American labor. We are going to find that these reciprocal-trade agreements will damn this Nation of ours. Just keep your eyes open for increased imports.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not also true that, as this program operates, foreigners have secured, through the operation of the reciprocal-trade agreement, dollar exchange, with which they have bought up to approximately $8,000,000,000 of the securities of the United States industries and in this way are edging in to a position where they can more or less control our industries?

Mr. RICH. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. A gentleman over here has raised the question, where would you invest this money?

Mr. RICH. First, let me ask, where are you going to get the money?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman believe it is sound procedure for us to tax the wage earner of this country excess amounts for the purpose of raising a $47,000,000,000 fund with which to redeem and pay the debt of the United States when he should have those wages for the purpose of feeding, clothing, and educating his family?

Mr. RICH. No; I do not. I think the gentleman is right, and I think he will find this is all going to work to the detriment of the American farmers, American labor, and American industry, and our country in general. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope nothing has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania which will cause this bill to be cut down. We need money in the State of Montana in connection with the construction of new post-office buildings. There are towns in my district in which the post-office accommodations are entirely insufficient. The post-office business is conducted in small, unlighted rooms. In towns of three or four thousand the post offices are located in rooms with scarcely sufficient office space or lighting facilities to get along. We have pending in the neighborhood of 17 applications for the construction of post-office buildings in eastern Montana.

My own city of Livingston, a city with a population of around 7,000, is located 125 miles distant from the Federal court to the east, and an equal distance from a Federal court to the west. We have not the services of a Federal court in my city. We are, therefore, going to ask the Congress for an appropriation of $225,000 to supply that district with Federal court accommodations, the headquarters of the court to be located in Livingston.

Mr. Chairman, speaking about the Budget, may I say we do not need to be alarmed at all about balancing the Budget. No business, private or public, at the expense of progress ever balances a budget until the income is sufficient with which to do it. Remember that we have exploited the United States and her natural resources through private industry for years. Our timber has been exploited by the hand of man and by destructive fires. Our country has been practically ruined by floods and drought. In other words, in one brief sentence the United States today is like an old run-down farm. It has to be repaired and built up. We have to get the money to do this work from the Treasury of the United States so that the present population and the generations yet unborn may live satisfactorily and comfortably in this country. We have the greatest country in the world if we will only take care of it, but we have not been doing that in the past. I do not expect to see this Budget balanced at the expense of the human beings of this country when, as was pointed out by our distinguished President not long ago, one-fourth of the population is suffering. Who wants to balance the Budget at the expense of human lives? Are we, as we did during the 12 long years of Republican rule, going to maintain the dollar above the principles of humanity, or are we going to make the dollar our servant instead of our master? So much for that.

Mr. Chairman, I am a new Member of this House. A statement was made here the other day by a Member of the House that in my opinion was one of the most vicious statements that has been made since my entry here. The Speaker was accused of coercion, the majority leader was likewise accused, as well as the other leaders of the House. These are not facts; never have I been asked to vote for or against a bill. The gentleman made the statement that the new Members of the House took no part in the legislation enacted by the House.

Mr. Chairman, I for one feel that my vote counts just as much in the passing of various measures in this House as the vote of any other Member of the House, whether he be Republican or Democrat. May I say further that from the time of my entry as a Member of this House the Speaker, the majority leader, the chairman of the Rules Committee, and every other older Member of the House has been mighty courteous to me and has assisted me in presenting my views to the House in my humble and poor way and has shown me every kindness that any Member, old or new, should demand in any legislative body. I feel that I have had a square deal from the officers of this House.

Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words in connection with something else that was said at that time? This sort of rot is being put out through the press of the country. It is stated that the foundation of our Government is being wrecked because new and additional members may be appointed to the Supreme Court. Think of it! Not a constitutional provision, either directly or impliedly, is violated by increasing the membership of that Court. If by increasing the membership of that Court you can make this a lawmaking body, as in theory it is, instead of a bunch of chattering beings that occupy trees and hang by their tails, then I say let us increase the membership of that Court.

I was told by a Republican before I came down here: "You think you are going to have something to say about the making of the laws of this country, but I will say to you that the Supreme Court will tell you what the law is in this country."

I was taught that we have three coordinate branches of government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. I was also taught that the judicial branch was for the purpose of interpreting the laws and not for the purpose of nullifying laws. There is the distinction. It is not the province of the Supreme Court of the United States to nullify laws except when it appears beyond rational doubt that they are violative of our Constitution. Why, Mr. Chairman, do you not realize that the rule of common right and reason which is being read into the court decisions of this country, by way of constructive limitations, came from the lips of a man who has been dead over 300 years? That was Lord Coke, who, in a decision and by way of dictum, made the statement:

> When a law conflicts with common right of reason a court has the right to declare it unconstitutional.

In other words, he took the position that when the court disagreed with the wisdom of the legislature, or disagreed with the reason for the legislation, it had the right to nullify such legislation.

This was never intended to be the province of a court. I call your attention to one of the first cases in this country to recognize this as a rule by way of constructive limitation, known as the Bake Shop case, decided in 1935 or thereabouts. The State of New York passed a legislative act which declared that employees could only work so many hours a day or week in a bake shop. Among other things, the Court made the statement that it was the first inroad on the right of private property, and in effect was dangerous legislation, and so forth. But that is not the ground on which is was held violative of the Constitution. Speaking for the Court, Mr. Justice Peckham in the decision used this language:

> In our judgment it is not possible in fact to discover the connection between the number of hours a baker may work in a bakery and the healthful quality of the bread made by the workman.

Think of it! Did not the Legislature of the State of New York know more about what was healthful and necessary for its people than a court sitting outside of the State of New York? It is not a far cry to say that, underlying many of the decisions of the Supreme Court nullifying the so-called New Deal laws, promulgated and enacted by Congress, the Court was motivated along the lines of the bake-shop decision.

Under our system of government, the Congress of the United States is the lawmaking branch. Bills are introduced, referred to a committee, attacked and defended in committee, testimony is taken thereon, every conceivable angle of the bill is threshed out in the committee, which later on is reported by that committee, to pass or not. When it finally comes up for a hearing before the House, it is likewise very, very carefully gone into, criticized, and defended. Every conceivable reason is advanced for and against its passage. Able Representatives take part in the debate and take part in the passage of these laws. These Representatives come from all States in the Union, fresh from the people. They know their needs, they know what legislation is required. They know best what is for the welfare of the country and our people. Is it right that any court should have the veto power or the nullifying power to pass upon the wisdom or lack of wisdom, the reason or lack of reason, for the passage of such laws by a body of Representatives, many of whom are just as capable and just as able, from the standpoint of lawyers, as any man who ever sat on a bench anywhere?

If the Court's judgment is to be substituted for that of Congress, then we no longer have in fact a legislative department. It exists only in theory. If by increasing the members of the Supreme Court acts of Congress may be regarded with more sanctity, then do you not think the proposal of the President would be worth while?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

REORGANIZATION OF THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, is there any member of this House who honestly believes that if the New Deal legislation which the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional had been held valid that the President's message of February 5 would have been sent to this body? In addressing myself to that message I shall pay particular attention to that paragraph in which the President said:

> I therefore earnestly recommend that the necessity of an increase in the number of judges be supplied by legislation providing for the appointment of additional judges in all Federal courts, without exception, where there are incumbent judges of retirement age (70 years) who do not choose to retire or to resign. If an elder judge is not in fact incapacitated, only good can come from the presence of an additional judge in the crowded state of the dockets. If the capacity of the elder judge is in fact impaired, the appointment of an additional judge is indispensable. This seems to be a truth which cannot be contradicted.

There are some phases of the President's message with which reasonable men can agree, but I wish to devote my attention to the fundamental proposal contained in the message and to be inferred from the preceding paragraph, namely, that of forcing, through humiliation, the retirement of judges of the Supreme Court above the age of 70 years by an act empowering the President to appoint associate judges in their place and thus brand those Supreme Court judges as senile. It must be obvious to any fair-minded person that no self-respecting judge would do other than retire if he were publicly branded as incapacitated and unfit for the discharge of his duties.

The President's proposal precipitates one of the gravest questions, in my opinion, in the history of our Republic. It is important that the real issue be clearly defined and to determine, if possible, exactly the purpose of the President's request, his motive in demanding the power to appoint as many as six new judges to the Supreme Court. Are these appointments sought to enable the Court to perform its functions more efficiently, or are they sought for the purpose of forcing the Supreme Court judges to interpret the Constitution in accordance with the views and desires of the President? If the President wants to increase the efficiency of the Court, it must be because the Court requires additional members to perform its work efficiently, or because by reason of the age of some of its members it is unable to do so. The President's proposal itself recognizes that no increase in the membership of the Court is required. Under his recommendation the Court would be increased in number only if, and to the extent, that Justices on the bench now 70 years of age or over fail to retire. In that event it is provided that the President shall appoint new Justices equal in number to those not retiring, to serve with them. If all six Justices of the Supreme Court now past 70 years of age retire, the Court will continue to consist of nine members as now. This provision shows that the President's purpose is to change the personnel of the Court and not its number. The proposal then is not one to increase the Court upon the grounds that it requires more members but rather because, as Warren, eminent historian, said in his well-known work on the Constitution, The Supreme Court in the United States History:

> The real grievance felt by the Court's critics is not the number of Justices who joined in setting aside the Federal statute but rather the fact that the Federal statute was set aside at all.

The President did not tell the people in his campaign that he would demand the right to appoint six new judges to the Supreme Court, and the Democratic platform of 1936 is silent on the subject. The Democratic platform contains the following paragraph:

> We have sought and will continue to seek to meet these problems through legislation within the Constitution. If these problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such qualifying amendment as will assure to the legislatures of the several States and to the Congress of the United States, each within its proper jurisdiction, the power to enact those laws which the States within their respective jurisdictions shall find necessary in order adequately to regulate commerce, to protect public health and safety, and to safeguard economic security. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Could any leader with a high regard for his great office make such a declaration in favor of an amendment to the Constitution and then substitute for it such a proposal as this for changing the membership of the Supreme Court? Mr. Chairman, this question is of such vital importance to the Nation, to posterity, and by example, to the rest of the world, that it goes beyond any partisan consideration whatsoever.

The time has come when we must lay aside all partisan considerations and ponder the future of our Government, the welfare of our people, and the probable results which would flow from granting to the President the power which he demands. On January 4, 1936, the President in his message to the Congress said in part:

> In 34 months we have built up new instruments of public power. In the hands of the people's government this power is wholesome and proper, but in the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy, such power would provide shackles for the liberty of the people.

Is it possible that the Executive seeks by bending the will and judgment of the Supreme Court to his desires, as he has already controlled the will of the legislative branch of the Government to his desires, to build up still further power in the executive branch of the Government?

There is no assurance that any President, whether Republican or Democrat, benevolent as he might be, would live to administer such an autocratic power either wisely or benevolently. Who knows what might be done by his successors in office? Well might we ask the question, Will they be puppets of a political autocracy who will shackle the liberties of the American people by this "new instrument of power"?

That has been the history of dictatorships. In connection with the subject let us turn to the remarkable prophecy and the clear description given by Daniel Webster, who nearly a century ago, in describing the case of the benevolent autocrat, declared:

> It is hardly too strong to say that the Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intentions, real or pretended. * * * There are men in all ages who mean to exercise power usefully, but who mean to exercise it. They mean to govern well, but they mean to govern. They promise to be kind masters, but they mean to be masters. They think that they need but little restraint upon themselves. Their notion of the public interest is apt to be quite closely connected with their own exercise of authority. They may not, indeed, always understand their own motives. The love of power may sink too deep in their own hearts, even for their own security, and may pass with themselves for mere patriotism and benevolence.

Mr. Chairman, it is our duty as Members of this Congress to look at this question clearly and calmly, without partisan prejudice, and to judge by the conditions and symptoms discerned in the light of history whether or not this proposal is based upon a sincere or mistaken impulse, or whether it is part of a plan to circumvent the Constitution.

Washington himself warned against amendment of the Constitution "by usurpation of power and by subterfuge."

Let us now examine briefly the history of constitutional government. It was with prophetic foresight which now chills the blood that the great analyst, James Bryce, nearly 50 years ago, foresaw exactly what is now proposed and which he said would sometime occur in our constitutional Republic. Listen to what he said in his book, The American Commonwealth:

> Suppose a Congress and President bent on doing something which the Supreme Court deems contrary to the Constitution. They pass a statute. A case arises under it. The Court, on the hearing of the case, unanimously declares the statute to be null, as being beyond the powers of Congress. Congress forthwith passes and the President signs another statute more than doubling the number of Justices. The President appoints to the new justiceships men who are pledged to hold the former statute constitutional. The Senate confirms his appointments. Another case raising the validity of the disputed statute is brought up to the Court. The new Justices outvote the old ones; the statute is held valid; the security provided for the protection of the Constitution is gone like a morning mist.
> What prevents such assaults on the fundamental law—assaults which, however immoral in substance, would be perfectly legal in form? Not the mechanism of government, for all its checks have been evaded. Not the conscience of the Legislature and the President, for heated combatants seldom shrink from justifying the means by the end. Nothing but fear of the people, whose broad, good sense and attachment to the great principles of the Constitution may generally be relied on to condemn such a perversion of its forms. Yet if excitement has risen high over the country, a majority of the people may acquiesce; and then it matters little whether what is really a revolution be accomplished by openly violating or by merely distorting the forms of law. To the people we come sooner or later; it is upon their wisdom and self-restraint that the stability of the most cunningly devised scheme of government will in the last resort depend.

Mr. Chairman, such was the statement of an eminent student of government 50 years ago. It might well have been written yesterday. It is commonly understood that the Executive intends by all his power of patronage, punishment, and persuasion, to force this legislation through this Congress as quickly as it is possible to do so. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that not one word, nor one hint, was given to the people of the United States during the last campaign that the President meant to make any such proposal, nor did anybody closely connected with him give to the Congress or to the country any hint that this proposal was to be made until it arrived in the message from the President on February 5.

I ask in all sincerity why this silence during the campaign and after election? Why this haste to expedite, even to the point of writing a bill to be passed, and sending it along with the message? Why is the President afraid to trust the Congress and the people in this matter sufficiently to give them time to examine its dangerous implications?

Can anyone, in good faith, argue that the constitutional method of amending the Constitution is too slow? The people provided the method and they alone can change it. Several amendments have been passed in a period of a year to 18 months, including the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, the women's suffrage amendment, and the "lame duck" amendment.

The President, in his message, has cited increasing congestion in the Courts as the motivating reason for his present demand to alter the framework of the judiciary. Why, Mr. Chairman, Attorney General Cummings, in his annual report on the Supreme Court which was issued January 6, 1937, stated:

> There is a decrease in the total number of pending cases, and in each class of cases.

Solicitor General Stanley Reed, in his report on the last full term of the Supreme Court stated:

> Every case argued or submitted at the term was disposed of before adjournment.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court is neither falling behind with its work, nor denying justice to applicants in order to keep its work current. The Court, as now constituted, is up with its docket and disposes of its cases with promptness. This promptness is made possible largely by reason of the extraordinary familiarity which members of the Court have with its decisions, and with the questions coming before it for review. This familiarity has been acquired through the continued services and long experience of the members of the Court. The effect of substituting six new members, however able, for those eligible for voluntary retirement, or, by addition of six new members to the present number, would be to retard and not to expedite the work of the Court.

The real reason behind this desire to change the personnel of the Court is to be found in the following figure:

In the years since 1789 Congress has enacted 24,902 laws. The Supreme Court, in all that time, has found only 73 of those acts, or parts of them, to be in conflict with the Constitution.

Out of those 73, barely 16 concern acts of Congress that conflict with the everyday lives of citizens. The other 57 were largely technical.

An examination of these figures discloses that during 144 years the Supreme Court found only 61 legislative acts of Congress, or parts of them, to be in conflict with the Constitution, but, during the last 4 years, the Court has found 12 to be in conflict, which is an average of three a year. Even more important—out of 16 Supreme Court decisions that bore on economic and social problems, 8 were decided in the first 144 years, and 8 were decided in the last 2 years.

Before reverting again, Mr. Chairman, to what statesmen of history have said by way of warning us against exactly such proposals as the President has made, I wish to call attention to the fact that if the mere passage of time which brings men to the point of 70 years is sufficient to disqualify them intellectually, as the President asserts, the world would have lost some of its most brilliant art, literature, and statesmanship. Indeed, some of the most brilliant men in this Congress would be disqualified under the President's stipulation and be forced to retire, and it would leave two vacant chairs in the President's Cabinet.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, the elder, was just executing his greatest writings at 74; at 75 he wrote his essay on Emerson. At 76 he wrote The Antipathy, one of the classics of American literature. Over the Tea Cups was published when he was 78.

The late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who for 21 years after he was 70 retained his magnificent powers of intellect, writing opinions which admittedly are classics, envied and admired by every member of the Supreme Court today.

History is filled with names of men like Commodore Vanderbilt, who between the ages of 70 and 83 added 10,000 miles to his railroads. Groat, in his seventy-first year, began his important work on Aristotle; Handel was 72 when he composed his greatest oratorio; Samuel Johnson was beyond 70 when he published his greatest work; Wordsworth was appointed poet-laureate beyond the age of 70; Meyerbeer, 72 when he composed his greatest opera; Galileo, 73 when he made his greatest astronomical discoveries; Verdi, doing his greatest work at 80; Hugo, still doing wonderful work at 80; Gladstone, engineering his greatest political coupe at 80; Henry Clay, Whittier, William Cullen Bryant, Joseph Jefferson, Cato, Plutarch, Bismarck, Goethe, John Quincy Adams, Charles Wilson Peale (the painter), Tennyson, Benjamin Franklin, Talleyrand, Michelangelo, Von Moltke, Izaak Walton, Pope Leo XIII, and others.

Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to enumerate the brilliant men who did their greatest work after they had long passed the age of threescore and ten. These illustrious names in history utterly refute the contention that senile decay and intellectual impairment come with the age of 70.

Students of history, students of government, statesmen of the past saw all too early how lust for power would raise its head in a constitutional republic.

Foreseeing with startling clearness the manner in which tyranny and despotism would raise its head, Judge T. M. Cooly, in the International Review for January 1875, said:

> The gloss of zeal for the public service is always spread over acts of oppression, and the people are sometimes made to believe that (zeal) to be a brilliant exertion of energy in their favor, which, when viewed in its true light, would be found a fatal blow to their rights. In no government is this effect so easily produced as in a free republic; party spirit, inseparable from its existence, aids the illusion, and a popular leader is allowed in many instances impunity, and sometimes is rewarded with applause, for acts which would make a tyrant tremble on his throne. (Bryce, p. 63.)

How and by whom, in case of disputes between departments of government, States, or citizens, is the validity or invalidity of a statute to be determined?

Such determination is to be effected by setting the statute side by side with the Constitution and considering whether there is any discrepancy between them.

It is obvious, therefore, that the question whether a congressional statute offends against the Constitution must be determined by the courts, not merely because it is a question of legal construction, but because there is nobody else to determine it. Congress cannot do so, because Congress is a party interested. If such a body as Congress were permitted to decide whether the acts it had passed were constitutional, it would, of course, decide in its own favor; and to allow it to decide would be to put the Constitution at its mercy.

The President cannot decide, because he, also, may be personally interested. There remain only the courts, and these must be the National or Federal courts, because no other courts can be relied on in such cases.

The judicial department of the Government is the umpire. The Supreme Court for generations has been the umpire in deciding what are and what are not valid acts of the executive and legislative branches of the Government within the meaning of the supreme law of the land—the Constitution.

Do we want the Supreme Court so tampered with by Presidential ukase as to compel the umpire to decide in accordance with the noise made by the grandstands or the howls of the team captains rather than in accordance with justice, fair play, and sound, fundamental, constitutional law? That is what the President proposes shall be done.

> The founding fathers of the Republic were extremely anxious to secure the independence of their judiciary, regarding it as a bulwark both for the people and for the States against aggression of either Congress or the President. They affirmed the life tenure by a unanimous vote in the Convention of 1787 because they deemed the risk of the continuance in office of an incompetent judge a less evil than the subserviency of all judges to the legislature or to the Executive, which might flow from a tenure dependent upon the will of either. The result has justified their expectation.

So wrote Bryce 50 years ago.

The evil which the founding fathers then feared would arise is the evil which confronts this House today.

It will be a sad day for the American people when all the powers granted by the people, under the Constitution, come under the control of one man.

The most illustrious Democrat this Nation has produced, Thomas Jefferson, warned that—

> A single consolidated government becomes the most corrupt government on earth. The concentrating of all power into one body has destroyed the liberty and the rights of man in every government which has existed under the sun.

The Supreme Court has been the anchor that has held America safe through many storms. Its absolute independence and integrity must never be in doubt. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I want to ask the gentleman in relation to his statement as to what Stanley Reed said: Did that apply alone to the Supreme Court?

Mr. DONDERO. I believe his statement applied to the Supreme Court. I do not know whether, by inference, it applied to all of the Federal courts or not.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman know what the condition of the courts are in the district?

Mr. DONDERO. I do not know except for this statement.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman has knowledge as to the condition of the dockets in the Federal courts.

Mr. DONDERO. I took Mr. Reed's statement for it.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman know whether or not they are very much behind?

Mr. DONDERO. I understand there is some congestion in the district courts and in the circuit courts; that out of 268, there are 34 somewhat behind where there is some congestion.

Mr. KELLER. Does not the gentleman think that the courts might have a personal interest as well as Congress?

Mr. DONDERO. My idea is that the founding fathers intended to keep the executive, judicial, and legislative branches independent of each other in order to remove any personal interest on the part of the courts in laws made by the legislative branch.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Reference has been made to the congestion in the district and circuit courts. As a matter of fact, the record discloses there has been a very gradual but substantial lessening of the congestion in these courts. Is it not probable that the present personnel can dispose of the cases in the next 2 or 3 years?

Mr. DONDERO. I have no doubt that the Attorney General had that in mind.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, since February 5, when the President sent his message on the reorganization of the Federal judiciary to Congress, hardly a day has passed without some mention on the floor of the message and the Supreme Court. Two things have stood out in speeches on the floor. One that "the poor man must be protected in his right to be heard by the highest court in the land", the other that we must uphold the Constitution, and any reform in the judicial system is going to tear down and destroy that revered document. And then we hear words, words, and more words to uphold and maintain the argument. All the argument deals with some phase of judicial reorganization and contains food for thought, but all, in my opinion, leave out the essential thing, the specific cure of the disease our courts are afflicted with and the remedy for the disease.

Does the poor man get to the Supreme Court now? Who ever heard during the past 20 years of a poor man being able to have his case heard by the Supreme Court through the use of his own funds? I should like to have a Member of this House name to me a single one. The Schechters made it in the N. R. A. case. They were by no means poor. They were the operators and owners of a good, going, profitable business, and when the case was finished they were, as a result of the cost of the litigation, in a court of bankruptcy. Does that sound like a poor man can take his case to the "highest court in the land"? If you gentlemen mean what you say, let us forget for a few minutes about the number of judges on a court and fix a way to let this poor man who has so much of your sympathy have some way to get before the judges that we already have. As for tearing down the Constitution, there have been no greater wreckers of the Constitution than some district judges of the United States. No Communist could have shown less respect for the Constitution than have some of these district judges, and there is not a Communist in the land whose work could be so effective, because these district judges do their nefarious work under guise of law. If I am not telling the truth and cannot show you to your own satisfaction the truth of my statement, then you have a right to be angry with me. If I am stating truth, then you are derelict in your duty if you will not endeavor to remedy the situation and make district judges upholders of the Constitution instead of its enemies. The good district judges, of whom there are many, do not need such laws, but the public needs them to protect itself from tyrannical district judges.

The Constitution provides, in article III, section 2, for a trial by jury in criminal cases. The seventh amendment provides the right of trial by jury in civil cases.

No informed practitioner will deny that it is a primary principle of the law among Anglo-Saxon people that the judge is the judge of the law while the jury is a judge of the facts. Now, let us see whether this is true in Federal district courts. Let me show you why a poor man never reaches the Supreme Court and how some Federal district judges become tyrants, by their acts destroy the constitutional right of trial by jury, become judges of both the law and the facts, destroy the value of testimony under the very guise of law, assume the power and authority of dictators and trample on every moral precept and legal right of the litigants. There is no place in the whole modern world where there is a dictator so autocratic as some of our United States district judges. A resident of the State of California or any other State in the Union is driving through my State. He is driving in a negligent and reckless manner at high speed and runs through a red light at a street intersection. A citizen of the State of Indiana, a pedestrian, is seriously and severely injured. Because there is a diversity of citizenship he cannot sue in the State court, or if he tries to sue there the defendant, who is insured with a good insurance carrier and represented by the carrier's attorney, has the case removed on motion to the Federal court. The plaintiff is without means, a laboring man in the low-salary brackets. He has no means whatever, and when he files his suit he must lay $5 on the desk of the clerk of the United States district court for the filing of the original paper and each copy, which the rules of the court require him to file. He must also pay $2 for the service of the summons on each defendant and mileage for the service of the summons at 6 cents a mile, regardless of the number of miles. To start his suit he must have all this cash on the barrel head. It is necessary in making up the issues to file motions, demurrers, and various other pleadings, and for and with each additional paper filed he must pay on the desk of the clerk, in cash, $2 per paper. We expect attorneys to be ethical. We expect them to keep the law governing champerty and maintenance. Where is this poor plaintiff going to get the money to even start his suit? But he does start it. The case comes to trial. Again the expense, the cash outlay for the man without money. He must have numerous witnesses. Regardless of where they live, before he can have a subpœna issued he must again produce 6 cents a mile in cash for the miles necessary to travel to serve the witnesses and an additional 50-cent service fee for each witness. Before his case comes on to trial this destitute plaintiff must pluck from thin air some place, somehow, this cash outlay to pay the clerk, the United States marshal, and other officers of the court.

Somehow he does it. Time for trial arrives. The Federal court does not supply a court reporter as do the State courts of record that would try cases of like character. You have no grounds for appeal unless you have a record with a transcript of the evidence. To protect his record therefore this destitute plaintiff must employ a court reporter and this is cash on the barrel head, too. He must have a transcript at 35 to 50 cents a page, and any attorney knows how few words go to the line and how few lines there are on one of those pages. It is not such a large transcript that can run into $500. He must have the money or he has no appeal. This poor man can only arrive before the Supreme Court by protecting his record with a proper transcript of the testimony. The case is tried with or without a reporter. It may be at this particular time the Federal district court is working a panel of 60 jurors. While the one jury is hearing your case the jurors who will compose other juries are in the courtroom and about the corridors. The evidence is all in and the court instructs the jury. In very few, if any, State courts would the judge be permitted to comment on the evidence. For him to do so would be reversible error. But the Federal courts hold that a judge may state his opinion of the evidence. And some district judges do it vociferously and often. He bases his right on the English practice. But he only selects that part of the English practice that appeals to him and permits him to act as a tyrant. English practice also allows the witness to state conclusion in the presence of the jury. This is a rule that the Federal judge will not allow to be applied in his court. So in instructing the jury he may say, and some Federal trial judges do say, that certain witnesses do not tell a reasonable or correct story and should not be believed by the jury while other witnesses on the opposing side are credible and well worthy of belief, and thus he invades the province of the jury to judge the facts, the credibility of witnesses and the weight of the evidence. This is his first step in nullifying the right of trial by jury. The second step is when the jury brings in its verdict. That verdict is delivered in open court. Keep in mind that under our system the jury is the judge of the facts. The jury as judges of the facts did not see them as did the district judge who is the judge of the law. They thought John Doe was a good witness and that his story was reasonable. They applied the law as given them by the judge to the facts as the jury found them and brought in a verdict in which 12 men on that jury concurred. But then some Federal judges lecture that jury in the presence of other jurors, and within hearing of those other jurors, that are to try other causes in that same court, and tells the jury that their verdict is preposterous—infers that they are lacking in intellect and integrity or worse—and in the presence of the other waiting jurors directs the marshal to strike their names from the jury roll and send them home as unfit for jurors.

That news with the names of the victim jurors and the statement of the judge is carried in the home-town newspapers, and the juror who has been victimized and persecuted for answering the summons to appear as a juror and reaching a verdict according to his own volition in accordance with the law suffers disgrace among his fellow citizens and friends. And those other waiting jurors who hear the tirade of the judge—who hear the order to the marshal to strike the names from the roll—are they free and untrammeled in their decision on the next case which is submitted to them? No. They are caught in the vise. To exercise their own free will and volition when it does not agree with the opinion of the judge is to be disgraced and insulted. The will of the district judge becomes also the will of the jury. This is not justice. Such practice is a travesty on justice. It is striking from the Constitution of the United States the right of trial by jury as that Constitution intended it to be. It is substituting the will of 1 man for the verdict of 12 citizens of the jury.

Let us begin at the bottom in this matter. The Constitution allows—more, it requires the Congress to keep the courts open to all citizens alike, to fix the practice and procedure to make the law function properly. Why argue about the personnel of a Supreme Court that millions of our citizens can never reach, because the cost of justice is too high? No matter who sits on that high bench, no matter whether they be conservative, radical, liberal, or jellyfish, young or old, men with the wisdom of Solomon or men of subnormal intellect, they are so far away from the average man that he cannot reach them even when he cries with a loud voice, for he does not possess the cash to waft his words to them.

And even when he gets away from the district court he must run the gantlet of the circuit court and the circuit court of appeals before he can come within sight of the temple of justice here on Capitol Hill. Each with its costs for filing of papers and printing of briefs and expenses of attorneys and attorneys' fees.

The President in his reorganization plan provides for a direct appeal on constitutional questions from the district court to the Supreme Court. This is a change in procedure that should have favorable consideration. The plan does not provide a means for the individual citizen without funds and a meritorious cause to obtain a hearing in the Federal courts nor does it provide a method whereby those Federal judges who are forgetful of the intent and principles of the Constitution can be curbed when they deprive citizens of substantive rights. I hope the Judiciary Committee, when giving thought to judicial reorganization, will take into consideration the malady that I have suggested and provide the obvious remedy. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I was certainly surprised to hear the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD] try to frame an indictment a moment ago against a court of his own State. It sounded to me as though he might have been a disappointed attorney for some litigant who had, in his opinion, suffered at the hands of the court instructing the jury. He used as his analogy a negligence case. He told us a lot about a barrel head and $5 and $2 and $1 and 50 cents on the barrel head, but he did not tell us anything about what the lawyer who represents the litigant, especially in these negligence cases, takes from these poor men whose cause my friend was so eloquently pleading.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I may say to the gentleman that I think in most personal-injury cases the lawyer gets entirely too much and the client gets the poor orphan's share.

Mr. DITTER. I am sorry that the gentleman did not make this admission without my prompting. The gentleman told us that the court had taken away from the poor man the rights that were his. I believe he has been at the bar long enough to know that whatever the direction and charge of the court may be, it is in accordance with the law.

Speaking for my own district, speaking for my own State, I resent the implication and innuendo made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD] with respect to the probity of the courts. I believe that the poor man has his day in court. I believe that the poor man has his opportunity. If the poor man is mulcted it is not from the 50 cents that he lays on the barrel head—and I declare we have not barrel heads in Pennsylvania—or the dollar or the $5 that he may lay there for the purpose of pleading, but it is rather because of a group of unscrupulous lawyers who take cases on a contingency basis, and after they have ultimately secured a verdict, remit but little to the client for his damage. [Applause.] I believe that the Court stands today as the one institution in this country which has defied the assaults of the demagoguery of those who are anxious to tear down democracy in order to make an appeal to the masses. I believe clear heads and clear thinking are required today. I believe it is a day when reason, rather than passion, should prevail. I believe it is a day when those motives that only too frequently lead to anarchy and to the destruction of institutions should not be the compelling influence of men who are learned in the law, and who have come before the court and have entered into an oath with the court, of fidelity to the court as well as to the client.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, fidelity to the court, to my mind, means recognition of the probity, the honor, and the integrity of the court. It means the acceptance of an obligation to aid the court in the administration of justice and securing respect for its decrees. If these charges the gentleman has made upon the floor of the House have any foundation in fact, then let him bring in a bill of impeachment against the judges in question; let him charge definitely that there are those men upon the bench who are not handling the scales of justice as they should; let him come in and make specific charges against the judges complained of instead of directing a destructive attack on the court as a whole.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman inform us whether he ever defended the poor man in court?

Mr. DITTER. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that I have defended not only the poor man but I have defended the harassed man in the courts. I have represented workingmen, laborers, poor men in workmen's compensation cases. These are the types of cases in which the demagogue delights to cry that there is no justice for the poor men. I can attest that the claimants have had the full protection of the courts and secured their rights. I believe—and pray God may I always believe—that the court stands as the guardian and protector of the life, liberty, and happiness of the poor man as well as the rich man. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I can hardly refrain from yielding to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is awfully nice. I have heard both speeches, and I join with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his stirring defense of the court, but I did not construe——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. In order to allow my friend the opportunity of interrogation, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not intend to interrogate. I intended to make an observation.

Mr. DITTER. An observation, Mr. Chairman, by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I did not construe the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana as being an attack upon the court. The gentleman from Indiana spoke with reference to the inability of the poor man, by reason of the expense involved, to obtain the trial desired. I construed it as an attack upon the Congress. I construed it as an attack that the gentleman, from his angle, probably was warranted in making, based on his observation of the court's power to instruct a jury on questions of fact. Many eminent members of the bar honestly differ on this proposition. Personally, I am of the school which believes that the judge should not instruct on questions of fact. They are not allowed to do so in Massachusetts. This, however, is not an attack upon the court.

Mr. DITTER. To be courteous to my friend, I want to permit him to make this speech. I shall not interrupt him. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts concluded?

Mr. McCORMACK. I assume that the time has concluded.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, in order to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to appear in the role of public defender for the gentleman from Indiana, I yield him 2 additional minutes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts accepts the characterization of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a compliment.

Mr. DITTER. I intended it as such, sir.

Mr. McCORMACK. I accept it as such.

Mr. Chairman, I am simply expressing the impressions made upon my mind. I do not say that I completely agree with the gentleman from Indiana in all of his observations, but I do say that the impression was not made on my mind that the gentleman from Indiana was attacking the court.

Mr. DITTER. I appreciate the gentleman's effort to defend the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; I am answering the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was either an attack upon the court or an attack upon a barrel head to which he frequently referred. I am not sure which it was; but I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that rather than appear as a public defender at the present time he should be a persuader and suggest to the gentleman from Indiana either the introduction of legislation in his own State or in this body seeking to cure the defects of which he complains. Has he presented a bill providing that we shall no longer have court costs—$5, $2, $1, 50 cents? Let him suggest remedial legislation rather than criticize the courts.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 17 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, since the President's message of February 5 I have received from the Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth Congressional Districts of the State of New York between 1,800 and 2,000 telegrams, letters, and petitions. Out of this number one person only requests me to back up the President in his reformation of the judiciary. I feel compelled, therefore, although, as you know, I very seldom speak in the House of Representatives, to give my views this afternoon on this most important question.

Mr. Chairman, in his recent message the President sent to the Congress his oft-repeated threat to thrash the judiciary, and I rise to challenge his right to revise the Constitution because of his clearly indicated impatience with the restraint placed upon him, and to brand as sharp political practice this scheme of New Deal personalities to increase the membership of the Supreme Court so as "to conform that tribunal to the needs of a modern day" under the guise of judicial reform. I am unalterably opposed to the cunningly camouflaged plan of radical theorists to wipe out the written Constitution and to place the Nation at the mercy of an executive power which has already demonstrated its ability to make a rubber stamp of the heretofore independent Congress.

It is not because I am a Republican that I oppose this proposed radical change in the distribution of power provided in the Constitution. The question transcends party politics. It is far too important to be passed over with party denunciation; too serious to be considered in a spirit of prejudice. In no sense is this a political struggle, and it should not be approached with any thought of party lines in mind. It should be met as an ill-considered demand of one branch of the Government for the cooperation of another to clip the wings of the third branch so as to create a supreme control in the Executive. In other words, it is an attempt to bend a hitherto independent Federal judiciary to the will of the Executive through the backing of a subservient Congress. Make no mistake, its approval would mean a readjustment of the checks and balances provided in the Constitution, for it is sadly out of line with the Constitution's segregation of official powers. Its success will undoubtedly mean the creation of a political rather than a judicial court—perhaps the destruction of our form of government as conceived by its founders—a short cut to dictatorship. The issue we must decide, then, is whether the delicate balance of powers, the fundamental law governing Presidents, Congresses, the States, and the courts themselves, is to continue or be relegated to the limbo of outgrown and discarded things. I think it is not.

Your liberties and mine have depended largely on the independence of the Court. Should we not, therefore, consider whether, if the Congress alters the character of the Court, it might at the same time alter the confidence of the public in that Court? We have a vast horde of people in the United States who still love liberty and are distrustful of impetuous executives and legislators. These people rely upon the conscience of the courts to protect their liberties.

But the vital question, the larger question, of course, is whether there can be any justification in the President's proposal to force the retirement of the older Justices of the Supreme Court by what is, in plain terms, nothing less than a threat to add six liberals to that high tribunal. Since the judges are appointed for life under a mandate of the Constitution, and no judge can be retired against his will, the only method of radically reorganizing the Supreme Court is for the President to persuade the Congress to change the number of the Court's personnel. While this has been done before, the method has never been justified. We know that the administration has been utterly dissatisfied with decisions of the Supreme Court which have invalidated legislation making extraordinary changes in the fundamental rights of citizens and States. Given authority then, the President, impatient of opposition, will promptly pack the Court with partisans—New Deal lawyers, who will not declare any of his pet measures invalid, however bad. The proposed change would place on the Supreme Bench men whose opinions are already known to the Chief Executive. These men, with the present sympathetic minority, would give a majority on the Supreme Court and thus uphold any legislation sponsored by the New Deal's "brain trust" and passed by the Congress. Here lies the frontal attack on the rigidity of the Supreme Court. Here is the challenge to the American system of government. Here is the subordination of the Court to the personal power of the Executive—the reconditioning of the judiciary.

If Mr. Roosevelt believes that age is a menace to enlightened conduct of the work of the Supreme Court, he should examine the record. How is he going to face the arguments based on the services of such men as Holmes, Brandeis, Marshall, and Story, to mention only a few? A glance at the ages of the sitting members refutes Mr. Roosevelt's contention. Liberalism flourishes equally in the oldest member of the Court, Mr. Justice Brandeis, and in the next to the youngest, Mr. Justice Stone. On the other hand, Mr. Justice Roberts, who is the youngest member of the Court, and Mr. Justice Van Devanter, the next to the oldest, represent the conservative point of view.

What the President is really asking for is a showdown between the other branches of the Government and the hostile judiciary. He is demanding the full measure of obedience from the judiciary accorded him by the legislative branch of the Federal Government. But have we, as legislators, any right to pledge that obedience for the judiciary?

Have we any right under our constitutional form of government to place in the hands of the President the control of all three branches? The Constitution divides the powers of the Government into three separate and independent departments. Would not the merging of all three under one head be the beginning of a dictatorship?

How could such a proposal "strengthen the administration of justice and make it a more effective servant of public need"? I do not see that it would. In fact, I see quite the opposite. I see only a proposal designed to safeguard the New Deal system against adverse decisions in the future and the assurance of approval of virtually any law the President manages to have passed. To me this is an unconscionable assault upon the integrity of all courts and an effort to compel the Supreme Court to abdicate its traditional power to interpret the Constitution.

Throughout the recent campaign the President gave no notice of any plan to enlarge the Court or to change its powers. He deliberately avoided the issue. You will all agree that by no stretch of the imagination can November's epochal electoral approval of the New Deal Party be read as a mandate to change the complexion of the Supreme Court and make its judges subservient. In failing to intimate in any way during the campaign that he planned so to revolutionize the system under which the Supreme Court operates, Mr. Roosevelt is guilty of a lack of frankness with the people and the Congress which does him no credit. The barrage of protest which began to pour in from a highly incensed citizenry who saw in the proposal the loss of their liberties, the beginning of a dictatorship, immediately the message was read, is evidence that the people gave him no such mandate when they voted for his reelection in November. It was promptly seen to be very clearly an endeavor to do by indirection what the President cannot do directly. We have every reason to believe that this move has been contemplated since the nullification of the National Industrial Recovery Act. In fact, the President has admitted this. We are also told that at a press conference he admitted the plain motive of the Supreme Court proposal is to secure the approval of the New Deal legislative program—pending and future. A year and a half ago, we are further told, numerous New Deal officials were put to work to study the problem of removing the obstacle which the Supreme Court had proved to be. Countless proposals and suggestions were sifted and studied during the political campaign last summer and fall, but the work was carried on in secret, and the President did not mention in a single one of his campaign speeches his intention to ask the legal right to take charge of the Supreme Court so as to make it conform to his will. At a time when he was seeking a mandate from the people it would have been only proper for him to confront them squarely with his proposal and give them an opportunity to answer him at the polls. He failed to do this, however.

If we place in the President's hands the power he is seeking let us see what the inevitable result will be. By our action we will have destroyed the effectiveness of the first branch of the Government, if not the Constitution itself. This so-called "reconditioning" of the judicial system is an attempt to confirm the New Deal philosophy through enlarging the personnel of the Court. An ingenious plan this to invigorate the Court by the introduction of new blood into it. What the President suggests is tantamount to telling the Congress and the public that the judges of our highest tribunal who have reached the age of 70 are incompetent. But we know he does not really mean that; he cannot. What he does mean, but fails to say, is that they have not embraced the policy of New Dealism, that they have outlawed basic laws of the New Deal, and since he is hampered by the Constitution from involuntarily removing the old blood which is hostile to New Deal acts, he proposes to appoint to the court six new judges who will reflect the New Deal interpretation of the power of Congress under the Constitution and thus clear the way for the resurrection of the principles of the N. R. A., the A. A. A., and other proposals giving authority for Federal jurisdiction over social and economic problems of national scope, held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. There can be little doubt that if the Congress accedes to the President's demand that we legislate into being a Court that would not rebuff his administration in the manner of a majority of the present Justices, the new members will be tacitly pledged to interpret the Constitution in the Rooseveltian theory, namely, that the Federal Government has unlimited power over labor and property and the liberties of the people. The scheme evades the method of change provided in the Constitution. It is a device to make the Roosevelt will supreme. It is an effort to get hold of the Court and bend it to one man's will. It is merely a striking back at the Court's refusal to interpret contested passages of the Constitution unanimously his way.

For my part I cannot believe that the Congress will lack the fortitude to refuse to accede to the President's demand for any such added authority as he now seeks in order that he may revise the Constitution to make it mean what he and his advisors wish it to mean, to radically change the distribution of power provided in the Constitution, and to appoint to our highest court men whose opinions are already known, men who with the present sympathetic minority will construe the welfare and commerce clauses as giving authority for Federal jurisdiction over social and economic problems of national scope. In justice to the people who elected us to represent them we must take time to weigh carefully all that is involved here. We must determine what this plan may mean to the future of our Nation as a republic having three independent and coordinate branches of government before we vote. And in so doing we must bear in mind that we are faced with no sudden emergency. So great a change should not be taken hastily. Surely there are a sufficient number of good lawyers in the House to assure for this measure full and searching discussion—the closest scrutiny. We have here a momentous question involving the future of our Government: whether we shall clothe the President with dictatorial powers.

And, finally, this was said while the adoption of our Constitution was under discussion "There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and Executive powers." Today this principle is attacked and in danger, although its vital truth is as self-evident now as then. Life tenure was assured to judges because the founders of this Government knew that to preserve government under law, independence of the judiciary is indispensable. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time today not because I wanted to listen to myself make a speech but because there are certain things regarding this most-important question that is before us now which it seems to me every Member of this House should discuss and consider, even though he be a new Member.

Before beginning my remarks on the major issue we face now, I would like for just a moment to speak about something connected with the bill under consideration and to pay a tribute, which I think is only too well deserved, to the Surgeon General of the United States, appropriations for whose work are included in this bill.

I refer, of course, to Surgeon General Parran, and I believe in his writings and in his works he has placed before this Nation a statement of the importance of a drive against certain disease, notably venereal disease, in this Nation, which is of sufficient weight that the time should speedily come when he may be put in position to conduct this drive.

It has been said here, in presenting his plan in reference to the reorganization of the judiciary, that the President has exhibited a great impatience; that he has gone beyond the mandate he was given by the people; and that he is attacking the Constitution. I take exception to all three of these statements, because it seems to me we have to look at this thing not only from the standpoint of particular questions involved but likewise from the standpoint of the larger aspects of the history of our Nation in recent years. That history has brought us face to face with a most difficult decision in the making of which I deeply sympathize with every Member of this House, whether or not I agree with him.

The President has placed before us in his recent message on the judiciary a most serious and important challenge. Not one of us can regard this challenge lightly or decide what he will do without the most careful thought and consideration. But the President has not created the problems that made his message necessary. The crisis we now face is the product of the times in which we live. It is a crisis not alone for the Congress, or the President, or the Supreme Court, but for the people of the Nation. It is a crisis which arises out of the necessity of a more flexible, more effective, and more responsive Government than America has ever needed before.

Our Nation once required very little government. It now needs a very large measure of governmental activity if our democracy is to survive. In the past the abundance of our natural resources and the smallness of our population made every man a potential owner of property and placed him therefore in a strong position to demand fair wages if he worked for another. Farmers who lost their farms could move West to take up new ones. Young people could take it for granted that they could find good jobs as soon as they finished school. We had a situation where economic conditions naturally produce democratic life and democratic political institutions.

None of these conditions prevails any longer. On the other hand, property tends now to concentrate more and more in a few hands. Our income- and inheritance-tax rates have so far hardly affected at all this tendency. On the other hand, millions upon millions of our people are in the position of having to work with tools and capital supplied by someone else. Millions also, even now, would be destitute upon the streets but for Government employment, or that very much less desirable thing we call "relief." Our future may well depend upon what we do about this unemployment problem. And certain it is that no agency in America can deal with it except the Federal Government. If we are to deal wisely with this problem, our Government employment of the unemployed must minister to social needs and be beneficial to all. It is a shame, for example, our slums have not been long since cleared and decent homes built for the people who live in such places—homes which can be rented by people of low incomes. But, lo and behold! we found that in the opinion of a district judge it was unconstitutional to clear slums. And who is to say what would have happened to millions of our farmers had the Government, under President Roosevelt, not acted to aid them? Yet much of that aid was held to be unconstitutional.

Recent floods and drought bring us face to face with the fact that our natural resources above all our precious soil are in danger. Again here, as the President has so well brought out in recent messages, we confront a national problem—a problem for an effective National Government. Not a week passes but some new problem is presented to us—a problem so obviously deserving of our consideration that even Republicans will vote to meet it.

The drive for old-age pensions is only one expression of the great cry of our people who cannot possibly provide individually against the hazards of modern life for a degree of security. And yet do you not recall how only a short time ago we were shocked to find that by court interpretation neither the Federal Government nor the States could pass laws protecting women and children against exploitation?

I could go on and on. But the only point I want to make is this: If we want democracy, hope, and a solution of our problems, we must have effective, efficient government, able to meet new problems in the best way. Indeed, we must have the very kind of government which was promised to the people by a man recently elected President by the largest majority in history.

THE TASK OF OUR DEMOCRACY

Much has been said in the House from the Republican side about the Congress giving up its powers and prerogatives to the executive branch of government, and especially to the President. Most of the argument in defense of this charge is based on the fact that a considerable number of agencies have been created and they, along with some of the departments, given a greater amount of latitude than ever was done before in carrying on their work. But I contend that this is only the inevitable result of an attempt on the part of Congress to adopt the functioning of our Government to the needs of today. Since greater governmental activity has become necessary, and since the work of government requires vastly more detailed work of many kinds than ever before, it has become necessary for the Congress not only to determine policy, as it has always done, but in addition to assign certain tasks to various departments and agencies and to grant them, for stipulated periods of time, considerable freedom in making out administrative plans. This is no surrender of power. It is only common sense.

The danger of Congress losing its prestige and influence in our Government lies not in the cooperation of Congress in setting up an efficient executive. It lies in the domination over the legislative power of Congress which the Supreme Court, and even the lower courts, have been exerting in greater and greater degree through the years.

From 1789 to 1864 the Court declared only two laws unconstitutional, for an average of one every 37½ years.

But from 1934 to 1936 it killed 13 acts, an average of 1 every 2 months.

All of which means, to me at least, that the Court has grown more and more ready to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, and that the gap between the congressional conception of the Nation's needs and the Court's interpretation of judicial precedent has grown wider and wider until something must be done about it.

And so I say this conflict is one inherent in the times—a conflict to try to make our American Government effective for America today. In general, greater latitude for executive departments helps toward reaching this goal. In general, nullification of acts of Congress by the courts retards our progress. And there you have the issue.

We divide over the question of what we want—whether we want progressive legislation or whether we do not; whether or not we are eager to straighten out the troubles of our industries, to protect wage standards, to solve the problem of agriculture, to do something constructive for the youth of America, to reclaim our "dust bowl" and control our floods, to end child labor, and to clear our slums. If we want to do these things, then in general we will be with the President. If we do not want to do them, or if we honestly and really believe they will get done somehow or other anyway, then we will be against him.

I am interested in legislation to take the profits out of war. What I mean is that I favor the passage of a law which will make it mandatory that whenever America drafts men for war she must also draft finances and capital and essential means of production. I can see no shadow of justice in paying well for the use of money, in permitting profiteering in orders for war supply, and at the same time sending our manhood out to be shot and mangled at $30 a month. But I am convinced that should we pass such a law it would, under present circumstances, be declared unconstitutional on the ground that the owners of the money or the factories so drafted would be deprived of property without due process of law. Against such an argument, of course, a liberal judge might point out that such a law as I have suggested would certainly provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare as opposed to the welfare of the profiteers. But I believe in the present Court he would be voted down and our attempt to take the profit out of war would be blocked. So, once again, I am for the President.

All the talk for and against the Supreme Court, all the talk about our Constitution, is really beside the point. Not one voice, in the midst of all the bitter criticism, has yet dared to say that what the President proposes is unconstitutional.

This is a matter of politics, not of the Constitution. And when we have all had time to cool off and see it in its big outlines, we will divide—conservatives on one side against the President, progressives on the other side with him.

OUR HIGHEST LOYALTY

I know, I think, just how some of us feel. I know that this matter of the Supreme Court is one on which conviction is likely to run very deep on both sides. I will state frankly and freely that I do not particularly like to vote for a bill to increase the number of judges. I would prefer trying to define the relationship between the Congress and the Court in some other way. Nor have I reached by own decision quickly or easily. I have talked to many people; I have thought long and have studied carefully conflicting opinions and alternate proposals. But in the end I have been driven to admit that there is no other way except the President's way in which the legislation which the preservation of our democratic life requires can be given a fair hearing in the next 3 or 4 years. I do not desire haste. And, as I have said, I will not particularly like to vote this legislation insofar as it applies to increasing the Supreme Court. But my highest duty is not to the Supreme Court nor to the party to which I belong nor to the President. My highest loyalty is to the people you and I are supposed to represent. And I believe their needs are still very great and that the President's proposal is the only way they can be met.

I never have subscribed to the position that our emergency is over, or the depression ended. I never have liked that sort of talk so very well. For I know that a far more accurate picture was given us by the President in his inaugural speech.

The fate of millions of our fellow countrymen is in our hands. I am not especially glad of this. Indeed, I wish it were not so, but it is a fact we cannot escape. We cannot provide a happy fate for them if our hands are tied. The President suggests a way to untie them. And, therefore, I am with him, with him through the bitterness of criticism, with him whatever the political consequences to myself.

And may I say here that just because Democratic Members support the President does not mean we are subservient to him or that we have not thought a question through. It has been charged that we on the Democratic side do not do our own thinking but wait for the President to do it for us. Well, for my part I believe I can honestly state that I have voted my sincere convictions on every measure that has come before us. You may remember that I did what I could to raise the appropriation for W. P. A. and Resettlement in the deficiency bill. And I will do the same thing again if I believe the needs of our people for work and bread and butter require it.

But I want to point out that if it is true that some Democrats let the President do their thinking for them, the same is true of some Republicans. The difference is that the Democrats wait to see what the President says and then decide that is what they are for; whereas the Republicans wait to see what he says and then decide that is what they are against.

And on the issue which we face today every one of us knows that it will require harder thinking and more courage to go with the President than it will to oppose him.

These are historic days. We have our choice, the President has his choice between subservience to a narrow legalistic interpretation of a great document on the one hand, and manly determination to justify the people's faith in democracy upon the other. Jefferson, himself a strict constructionist, faced that choice. On the one hand stood the fact that the Constitution did not specifically give him power to add to the area of the United States by purchasing land from a foreign power. On the other hand stood the need of the Nation for Louisiana. Jefferson chose loyalty to the people's need as the highest loyalty. He bought Louisiana and future generations have called him a great man. And fortunate indeed it was that up to that time it had occurred to no one that the Supreme Court could nullify an act of Congress. Else we might have been today a nation confined to the east bank of the Mississippi.

Mr. GEARHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS. I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. GEARHART. The gentleman has made the statement that up to the time of the Louisiana Purchase the Supreme Court of the United States had not declared any law unconstitutional. Is the gentleman not aware that the circuit court of the United States, a court then composed of two Justices of the United States Supreme Court and one district judge, prior to the rendition of the decision in the Marbury against Madison case by the Supreme Court of the United States, had in at least three instances declared laws of Congress unconstitutional and for that reason void?

Mr. VOORHIS. No; I did not know that, but I am open to conviction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Marbury against Madison in 1803.

Mr. GEARHART. That is not the first one by our Federal courts. It was the first one by the United States Supreme Court, however.

Mr. VOORHIS. The fact is there was no suggestion made that the Supreme Court should nullify Jefferson's act.

Mr. GEARHART. Does the gentleman realize that the question as to whether the Supreme Court had the power to declare unconstitutional was debated in the Constitutional Convention?

Mr. VOORHIS. Yes.

Mr. GEARHART. And also the gentleman is aware it was debated thoroughly when the matter of the ratification of the Constitution was before the people and the various State legislatures?

Mr. VOORHIS. If I could have a couple of extra minutes I could secure from my brief case at my seat in the House a passage from the debate between Hamilton and Madison on that very point, in which Alexander Hamilton argued that the courts should have the right to nullify acts of Congress, but Madison said it was not so intended in the framing of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. GEARHART. The gentleman, of course, knows that James Madison reversed himself subsequent to that time, and that before he died he freely conceded that the Supreme Court did have the power to declare laws unconstitutional?

Mr. VOORHIS. I realize there has been an evolution in the building up of the power of the Court to do so, yes, but I want to make the point again that up to the time of the Louisiana Purchase, and certainly during the time our Constitution was in the process of formation, the question was discussed, and Madison, among others, brought out the fact that it was not a part of democracy that the Court should have that unequivocal power, and, further, when we speak of the matter of checks and balances, we must remember that if that system is to work properly there must be some place along the line where Congress can protect its own right to legislate in the interest of the general welfare of the country. At present if a law is declared to be unconstitutional the Congress has no recourse from that decision, even though it was rendered by a district judge. This seems to me to be government by checks but without a balance.

It has been shouted from the headlines and charged on the floor of this House that if Congress decides in the President's favor in this instance democratic government will be threatened and we will be on the way to dictatorship. I believe such talk is ridiculous. The very people who say such things frequently add that we must not desert the time-honored practices of Anglo-Saxon people. In this I agree with them, but for the sake of their own argument they have suggested the wrong thing.

In England they have a constitution which briefly consists of time-honored precedents, unwritten but understood, and one of these precedents is that an act of Parliament is the law of England, subject to no court review whatsoever. Let us be plain, frank, and, if necessary, blunt. Every one of us knows that the only undemocratic element in our whole American structure of government is the assumption by nine Justices appointed for life of the right to nullify acts of Congress, passed by recently elected direct representatives of the people.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman draws attention to the fact an act of Parliament is the supreme law of the land. That brings up the question of the set-up of the English Government as compared to the American Government. In England the people are very much imbued with the idea of their liberty under the English Constitution. There is no large number of people other than English in England. In America the situation is quite different.

Mr. VOORHIS. I do not think it is quite different.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. In America there are large groups of citizens who have much to do with the shaping of the policies of the United States Government.

Mr. VOORHIS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Many of these people know very little or nothing about the history of the formation of this Government or of the Constitution; is that true?

Mr. VOORHIS. In a limited degree that may be true, but by and large we have been able in the United States to teach the people the ideals of American democracy rather well, and I believe we can continue to teach them to have faith in American democratic principles, and I believe that will do a great deal toward solving our own problems. [Applause.]

Argue for the perpetuation of that power if you will. But do not say you argue for it in the name of democracy. At bottom the argument for continuation of the Court's assumption of power is evidence of a lack of faith in the ability, the patriotism, and the good will of the Congress. It is evidence of lack of faith in democracy. I do not share that lack of faith.

THE LESSON OF HISTORY

Every outstanding President our Nation has ever had has had conflict with the Supreme Court. The issue has been piling up. Andrew Jackson met it. Abraham Lincoln fought a war over it. And both of these men were called "dictators" and "tyrants." Theodore Roosevelt had it, too—and spoke out in meeting about it. He, too, was called a willful man, seeking his own power and glory. Long ago Washington and Jefferson were called dictators, and in Jefferson's case it was charged that the terrors of the French Revolution would visit America if he had his way.

Yet these are the great men of American history. This conflict between Presidents, who attempted to act for America, and the courts which blocked their efforts is not new. It has piled up, and we in our generation are called upon to bear the brunt of it.

The cry of "fascism" has been raised. How ridiculous it really is when we analyze it. Is any remote suggestion made that the President or Congress should not be elected by the people as they have always been? Is any remote suggestion made by the President that the basic liberties of the people be done away? Does anyone seriously doubt that the President's main concern is the protection of those rights for those who cannot protect them themselves? Does the bitterness of criticism heaped upon the Presidential head sound like he was becoming a dictator removed from popular control. It is a step away from fascism, not toward it, if we remove our Government from control by reactionary interests or men appointed for a life tenure. If fascism ever does come to America, it will not come from an increase in power of the people's elected representatives. It will come rather from the very increase in power of great economic forces of privilege who are the very people most concerned to perpetuate the Court's power at this time.

Let me conclude by saying this: We face an issue that will not down. When we have passed the President's bill we still will not have faced it fully. I shall vote with the President. No White House lobbyist has told me to. No patronage can be taken away from me, because I have never had any. I shall vote with him because I believe it is my duty to needy people to do so. But when I have done so I shall not feel that I have completed my duty. I believe we must go on. I believe we must bring the issue clearly before the Nation. No one questions the desirability of the Court protecting the basic structure of our Government and the fundamental rights specifically set forth in the Constitution. What some of us do question is the right of the courts to take from Congress the determination of the policy of government in seeking to promote the general welfare.

Either by constitutional amendment or the passage of an act limiting Supreme Court power in certain spheres, this issue can be presented squarely to the people. I think one of the methods should be taken even if the President's measure is passed.

These are historic days. Let us have tolerance, understanding, if possible a sense of humor, and faith in the common people of our Nation. But let us see the thing from the standpoint of lasting values. And let us understand that not alone the precedents of the Supreme Court but also the fate of needy little children, helpless unemployed men, insecure old folks, and overworked and underpaid mothers hang in the balance and await our action. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say on this subject this afternoon is not inspired by any of the political parties that are represented in this House. I do not know that what I have to say will square with the views of the people who sent me here, because this matter was not at issue in the last campaign, but I want it understood that whatever I have to say on the subject is said for the purpose of having the record clear and represents my own views and the views of no one else.

If the House will permit me to finish my statement, I will ask for additional time in which you can take up the matter of questions and you will all be answered. You may not be answered correctly, but you will be answered.

THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Many of the criticisms made by the President with respect to courts are true and the fact that he had the courage to make his statement in a message will be, in the long run, for the general good.

For example, the Supreme Court of the United States has no right to refuse to hear only a small percentage of the appeals presented to it. The Court refused to hear the Hauptmann appeal, and as a prosecutor of many year's experience, I am not satisfied that Hauptmann had anything to do with the actual kidnaping. With his execution, there is probably no remote chance of ever finding out the actual facts in the case.

Under the present rules of procedure, there is absolutely no chance for a poor man to ever reach the Supreme Court with any case no matter how meritorious it may be. Filing fees, mileage for the subpena of witnesses, certificate fees, all payable in advance, and printed briefs make it impossible for poor people to ever reach the Supreme Court even in normal times. In times like we have experienced during the last 10 years and under the present rules of the Court, any justice awaiting a citizen in the Supreme Court of the United States is as far away from him as any benefits that may accrue to him in the great hereafter.

Secondly, the President's message has more clearly defined the position of the Supreme Court, that it, as well as Congress and the Executive, are mere servants of the people and not their masters. There is no particular halo around the head of any judge.

With all this admitted, I do not think we should, in the slightest degree, recede from our form of democracy, composed as it was by the framers of it, as a form of government with three independent branches operating independently, but all to operate in the interest of the general welfare of all the people. The theory of the framers was that the Congress would enact the laws, the Supreme Court would determine whether they fit into the Constitution, and the President would carry them out. This clearly defined function of each of the three branches would be operating today without discord had Congress always acted promptly. But Congress has grown, during the years, into an inactive body. Its two-party system, the seniority rule, and many other obstacles to progress have lost to the Congress the confidence and often the respect of the people. In emergency times the people want action, not delays; hence the people have grown into a state of mind where they look to the President to not only execute the laws but to write them. The fact that the President today is the most vital force in the legislation of Congress is due entirely to the inactivity of Congress and not to the desire of the President.

If Congress will take an invoice of itself and begin to function, the general welfare of the people can be maintained under our three-division system of government; and I, for one, am not in favor of scrapping this Government now for any other form of government yet tried or contemplated. There are those who desire to destroy the Government and build up something new. They say this Government cannot be patched up but must be destroyed. I am not one of this number.

The Supreme Court must be maintained in its independent capacity, and yet it must perform a service which has been imposed upon it by the Constitution itself. There is no doubt now but what this Court would have always stood in better position with the people if the tenure of the office had not been made for life. That cannot be changed now unless the people change it by an amendment to the Constitution.

The Congress can lighten the burden of aged Judges by passing an act providing that when judges hereafter reach the age of 70 years, and still desire to continue, that the President shall have power to appoint a Judge to assume some of the burden.

To prevent any President from a wholesale appointment of Judges—evidently for the purpose of having his program sustained, right or wrong—the act should not affect any member of the Court who has now arrived at the age of 70. The question of age is only relative—some men are at their best at 70; some are out of commission at 60.

The vital point in the whole program is that I am not willing to trust any President with the power to make a wholesale appointment of Judges. That would mean that any plan the President proposed would probably be sustained. It might work all right with President Roosevelt, but Roosevelt will not always be President. A benevolent dictator is always to be preferred to a democracy, but the experience of the human race has demonstrated that benevolent dictatorships die with the benevolent dictator.

Should someone become President who is absolutely opposed to the policies of Roosevelt, would the people want that President to have the power to make a wholesale appointment of Judges for the evident purpose of sustaining his program? I think not.

It is quite generally conceded that the Constitution is elastic enough to permit the progress of modern democracy. Judges have, however, at times failed to either recognize or consider new conditions and interpret them. But to hold that the Supreme Court must always sustain what any President thinks should be done would be to dismiss the Court entirely. The present Supreme Court, in the Minnesota moratorium case and many others, has indicated its knowledge and sympathetic consideration of new problems. There is not nearly as much danger to our democracy to arise because of the failure of the Supreme Court to recognize and relieve abuses as there is in turning over to any President the control of the Court.

We must guard our liberties with the same spirit we did in the days of the forming of this Government. Even if the change would be a good thing for the general welfare at the moment, we should not surrender our principles of independence for immediate convenience. In the long run this Government will be made responsive to the people's will, and we must make doubly sure that the Government always remains in the hands of the people. If the people themselves, by their vote, want this change, well and good; but for Congress to do it is taking a step which, in my opinion, this Congress has no right to do, either upon moral, legal, or constitutional grounds.

In my opinion, there is no truth whatever in the repeated charge that President Roosevelt wants to become a dictator of this country. Those who personally know any of the Roosevelts know that this charge is untrue. President Roosevelt is probably anxious to see things done. He has stepped into the legislative field because of the inactivity of Congress. Other Presidents have done that, but it is entirely the fault of Congress. The President no doubt thinks his plans and ideas will be for the best interests of the American people, and that the Supreme Court does not approve of his measures with that degree of enthusiasm which he himself feels. Even though this be so, no President is infallible, and I will never consent to allow any President to overhaul an entire Court, even though I feel the President is actuated with the very highest motives of public service.

Should future events demonstrate that economically the President's views are not sound; that his policy of continuing to borrow money and pay interest when it is not necessary is wrong and some day will be corrected; that the policy of the President in reviving foreign trade at the expense of agriculture is not right; that the President's failure to offer a plan that will save farm and city homes from the terrors of foreclosure and dispossession is as reactionary as any decision of the Supreme Court in the last 10 years; that the social-security plan of the President is nothing but an abject dole system for the aged of America and is no honorable security at all; then what shall we say if, in the meantime, we have failed to not only stand up and be counted as Congressmen, but have also made the Supreme Court a subservient instrument of government?

If this democracy is to remain, the control of it must be left with the people. The people speak and can only speak in Congress through their elected representatives. We have no legal or constitutional right to surrender our duty and avoid our responsibility. The President is willing to do his duty as he sees it, and we respect him for it. We will come nearer preserving democracy if we, in this Congress, are willing to maintain the principles we think to be right, and above all else we should not weaken the power of either the Executive or the judiciary to assume responsibility, along with this Congress, in preserving upon this continent the best form of free government ever experienced by mankind. Our duty is to preserve it; it is our duty to make it better, more responsive to the will of all the people. Those who criticize the Government for its shortcomings, in this spirit, are its supporters and not its destroyers. I make this pledge to the people of these United States: I believe in this Government as now constituted; I believe we have allowed practices to develop in it which are fast destroying it. These evils must be corrected. We must have the courage to say so and the will to fight for freedom. Our duty is to make this fight, and I have faith that, through the three branches of Government working for the general welfare of all the people, that in our generation it cannot be said that we failed to defend democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The gentleman stated a while ago in his argument that the function of the judiciary was to see whether the laws enacted by Congress squared with the Constitution. I want to call the gentleman's attention to that statement. Should not the gentleman really have said, and was it not his opinion, that the function of the Court is to interpret the laws that might be presented to them for consideration after having been passed by the Congress?

Mr. BURDICK. Well, in an elementary way, here is what any Supreme Court ought to do. They should have before them the Constitution of the United States, as we should have, and sometimes do not have, and we should have the new law put alongside the Constitution and then determine whether there is anything about that law that we are prohibited from doing by the document alongside it.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The reason I bring the matter to the attention of the gentleman is that I was afraid he had committed himself to the theory that the Supreme Court, under the Constitution, is given the power expressly or even by indirection to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress.

Mr. BURDICK. If the gentleman will look at article III, second section of the Constitution, he will find not only that authority in express language, but if the gentleman will read the Constitutional Convention debates, he will see that it was expressly debated whether or not the Court should have the power to review an act of Congress.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Does the gentleman mean to say that in his opinion the Constitution of the United States vests power in the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I have never so understood the law.

Mr. BURDICK. If somebody will hand me a copy of the Constitution, I will point it out to the gentleman.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It is contended that the Constitution does not specifically grant that power. If not, then neither does it specifically give them the power to pass upon the life or death of a man charged with crime.

Mr. BURDICK. That is correct, and I am much obliged to the gentleman for his contribution; but I think it is a pretty good idea in answering that question to read from the Constitution itself. I made a speech here last year on that subject and quoted that provision of the Constitution, and I will refer the gentleman to my speech of last year if I am taking up too much time in trying to locate that provision of the Constitution now.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I will just state to my friend from North Dakota that I was surprised at the gentleman's making the statement, and I do not believe the gentleman can find in the Constitution anywhere any such statement. I am sure the gentleman is sincere, but since Marbury against Madison it has always been a question for argument.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I would not state anything in this Congress that I did not believe to be true. I know this to be true, and when some other gentleman is speaking here this afternoon I am going to ask him to yield to allow me to read that provision of the Constitution, since my time has now expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am no worshipper of judges; nor have I been for many years a hero worshipper of any kind. Good men are always entitled to every respect and honor, but too many idols develop feet of clay.

Napoleon, in commenting on the French Revolution, said this:

> Vanity was the cause, liberty was the pretext.

No one knew better than he, and no bigger hypocrite and few craftier politicians ever lived.

If we go down through the ages, as I read the record, we will find that the Greeks invented the bright idea of giving unpalatable proposals palatable names.

We will also find that Plutarch, in his life of Themistocles, said:

> In great crises and exigencies the common people turn not to reason but to strange and extravagant ideas.

In the light of history how long have democracies or republics lived? As a rule a very short time. How long have benevolent tyrannies lasted? As stated by the gentleman from North Dakota, some as long as the life of the benevolent dictator, and some benevolent dictators in a few years have turned out to be worse murderers, plunderers, and despots than history hitherto had example of.

Referring to his hunting for the constitutional provision by the gentleman from North Dakota, I think I have in mind the provision of the Constitution referred to by him, and if it is not plain language, I do not know what plain language is.

Article III, section 1, says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Mark the words, "the judicial power." What is judicial power? It is the power to judge and decide.

Why would they not diminish the compensation of judges? In order that the judges may be set aside or be uninfluenced by any other particular branch of government. That is the reason. To build a barrier around the judges and thereby try to shield them from any and every strain on their honest opinion.

Section 2 of the same article says this:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution.

In the name of God, is not that plain language? Could it be made simpler or more understandable or clearer? It is a general principle laid down, fixed, fastened, cemented into the organic law and to be changed only by constitutional amendment submitted to the people. That is the Constitution. Why have we a written Constitution? We have a written Constitution because of the oppression of the people and the violation of natural and political rights in the ages prior to the time that our Constitution was inscribed. It was set out there in writing so that those oppressions could not be repeated and those rights could not be violated; so that the liberties of the people and the right of individual action, the right to speak and express and act for themselves, would be perpetuated to posterity by the Constitution itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BURDICK. Section 2 which the gentleman just read, was the section that I had in mind, and, in my opinion, it leaves no doubt as to the authority of the Supreme Court to inquire into an act of Congress.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. But if there were a doubt, the people of the United States have acquiesced in the Supreme Court's authority declaring laws of Congress unconstitutional.

Mr. MANSFIELD. For more than a hundred years.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes; for more than a hundred years. Does any man here say that this Congress should not have restrictions placed around it? Does any man say that the spirit of mob violence cannot take possession of this Congress or some later Congress? That is another reason we have a Constitution. It is to prevent us from injuring ourselves and injuring our people when some spirit, contrary to that Constitution, to reason, and to humanity, takes hold of the people and engenders in them some impulse to do something that would violate individual rights. I am no reactionary. I do not have any money at stake in this issue, except to protect myself and family from any confiscation of a very humble home. I am not a bloated bondholder. I have been a Democrat all of my life, when it was not convenient, not politic, not beneficial socially or financially, not even considered altogether sane, to be a Democrat in Pennsylvania; and I suffered because I was a Democrat in Pennsylvania for a good many years. But, my friends, in my youth I was taught respect for the Constitution of the United States. I was a Democrat by inheritance and by conviction before I ever heard of President Roosevelt and before the nomination in 1932.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes; certainly, to my good friend.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume the gentleman is discussing the President's proposal to some extent. Wherein does it violate the Constitution?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I was not discussing his proposal, but I will say this to the gentleman in that connection: That the President's proposal directly does not offend the Constitution; but the President's proposal, stripped of all verbiage, seems to indicate a desire that the Supreme Court shall give a more enlightened view of certain legislation, a view conforming, of course, with his own; it is outside influence on the Court which is fundamentally, basically in violation of the written Constitution and every American tradition of politics and law.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LEAVY. Does the gentleman mean to imply by that answer just made that the President, when he appoints anyone to the Supreme Court, would require of those people whom he appointed a pledge, either directly or by implication, that they would follow his dictates in passing upon matters that might come before them?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; I do not make any such implication.

Mr. LEAVY. Does the gentleman mean to imply that the men who would accept that high honor would accept it with a reservation that they would decide issues brought before them in accordance with the desires of the Executive who appointed them?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I make no implication except that we know that the President has made this proposition to reform or reorganize the Supreme Court; and does the President deny what he wants?

Mr. HOUSTON. He certainly has not indicated that he intends to influence future judges.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I make no such implications. Let the acts stand for whatever they are. Let the gentleman draw his own conclusions. Let every citizen do the same.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SOUTH. In reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] I should like to ask if the President does not want this change in order to carry out his program, then why does he want it? It goes without saying, if I may say so, that he does expect the new Court to be in accord with his program to the extent that such program can be carried out. Otherwise there would be no need for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman from Texas know of any member of the Supreme Court today who has been subservient to any President's will?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am not entering into any such controversy as that, and I am not talking about that. I am contending for old-fashioned interpretation of laws by a free, untrammeled, and uninfluenced Court, as nearly as possible.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. The very fact that the Court, as now constituted, has vetoed certain legislation which the President favors is the principal reason, is it not, for wanting to change the personnel?

Mr. HOUSTON. What reason has the gentleman to believe that any man appointed in the future will be subservient?

Mr. SOUTH. I do not want to encroach further upon the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we hear in support of this plan to reorganize the Supreme Court the argument about a mandate from the people. It is stated in the newspapers that the President said that ever since the throwing out of the N. R. A. by the Supreme Court—and I was for the N. R. A.—he has been considering some means of getting done what he says will be done by this plan.

Who voted on that plan in the last election? I voted for President Roosevelt. I voted for the Democratic ticket. I say with emphasis the Democratic ticket, or what I thought was the Democratic ticket. I had no idea that this plan to revise, revamp, or reform the courts was coming up. Thousands upon thousands, millions of people never thought of any such proposition.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CURLEY. Did the gentleman know in 1932 what the proposed plan of the candidate for President on the Democratic ticket was?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I thought it was the Democratic platform.

Mr. CURLEY. Was it not the same situation in 1936? The gentleman did not know what the requirements would be to take care of the 27,000,000 people who voted for him.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am not sure I understand the gentleman. I did not know, but the proposition was not put up nor even hinted at. Why can we not amend the Constitution as provided in the Constitution?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman know how long it took on the child-labor amendment? It is still out.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. How long did it take?

Mr. HOUSTON. How long will it take for this?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of what the people will do; whenever they want it they will act. How long did it take them to call their legislatures together and conform with the social security bill or to enact or repeal the prohibition amendments? The average time for constitutional amendments is probably about a year.

Mr. HOUSTON. Nobody knows how long it will take.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania called a special session of its legislature to comply and conform to the requirements of the social-security bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman think that the people who are crying for an amendment to the Constitution today would support the amendment if it were proffered to them?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. How could I know? For myself, I stated on the public platform that if necessary for the people of this country, we could go through the Constitution in the way that the Constitution provides. It can be done directly and not by indirection and subterfuge.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman think that the people of this country have faith in the Chief Executive at this time?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Oh, it is not a matter of having faith. For that matter, the faith of many peoples has been violated many times in the history of man by crafty politicians.

Mr. HOUSTON. After the way they voted? They elected you to support his program.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Oh, I do not know about that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I do.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman presumes much and covers a wide field. Because I told the people many times on the platform if they wanted somebody to come down here and say "yes" to everything the President wanted, not to vote for me. I told them that. I have heard in this House for 3 years that we all came in on Mr. Roosevelt's coattails. Possibly we did in a way, but the election did not mean that every man who was elected came here to say "yes" if the President said to blow the dome off the Capitol.

Mr. HOUSTON. But if we thought the President was right we should support him, should we not?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes; most undoubtedly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think he is right.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. All right. You support his plan. I am only arguing a different proposition. I see the thing differently from what the gentleman does.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe you do.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Now, this is another thing to consider: Liberty is the most priceless thing that man has. There may be many things that we as a democratic people cannot get because of our form of government, or, at least, cannot get expeditiously, but it is better that we do without some of these material things, at least temporarily, than that we by indirection, by mistake, by chance, by thoughtless and precipitate action destroy that Constitution which was intended for the protection of the humblest individual. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained on this occasion to say something in this debate. I regret that I have not had time to produce a scholarly effort such as I have heard here this afternoon.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] gives me the keynote for my first remark. The gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of that great American treasure, liberty. I, too, prize liberty. I want to call your attention to the fact that there are several different brands of liberty. A notable woman rolled down the cobblestone streets of Paris in about 1792 on her way to the guillotine. She was a very cultured woman, one who had been an exponent of liberty, but as she rode down the street to the guillotine she heard the mob shouting behind her, "Liberty! Equality! Fraternity!" This woman, Madame Roland, exclaimed, and rightfully so, "O Liberty, what crimes have been committed in thy name!"

I want to remind you that we worship at the shrine of liberty. Sometimes we have one conception of liberty and sometimes another conception. Let me give you my conception of the right kind of liberty for Americans. I am not enthusiastic about the natural liberty of the eighteenth century such as the revolutionists of France and Europe were shouting in 1792; I am thinking of another brand of liberty.

The statue of the Goddess of Liberty stands almost over our heads as we sit here in conference. Across her brow we write the word "liberty." We write the word "liberty" all over our institutions. It is one of the four great fundamental human rights announced in the Declaration of Independence and crystallized in our institutions. What brand of liberty? It is that brand, I think, which has been well expressed by Katherine Lee Bates in a song which might very well be our national anthem, America, the Beautiful. It is a prayer, almost. Katherine Lee Bates said—and what a mighty concept this is. If that woman had never done anything else but give us this fruitful phrase, it would put her in the Hall of Fame forever:

> America, America, God mend thine every flaw,
> Confirm thy soul in self-control, thy liberty in law.

Some of my young college students, when I used the expression, "Liberty in law", or when it was used in that great song, have sometimes thought that it was some sort of new marriage relationship; but I call your attention to the fact that it is a phrase, not a hyphenated term. [Laughter.]

Liberty in law. That is the brand of American liberty that means not the natural liberty of the wilderness or the jungle but liberty increased because it is delimited, increased because it is confined and defined; that is American liberty, that is our civil liberty; and I am for its preservation. I fear, Mr. Chairman, that many of these folks who bandied the word "liberty" so freely before, during, and after the last campaign are thinking of another kind of liberty. They are thinking of the liberty of business to run unhampered and unregulated. A great many of our economic reactionaries today, no matter on which side of the aisle they are, to which party they belong, are thinking of the laissez faire days of this country, the half century following the War between the States. They want big business and all kinds of business to run free, every man for himself and the devil take the hindermost. When certain industrialists cry for liberty, they probably mean the liberty of a fox in a chicken roost.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this country can longer continue with the degree of freedom which big business experienced at the close of the last century. I believe that big business must give up some of its liberty and come under regulation. I believe this is one of the real issues before us. I did not intend to go in this direction in this discussion, but the gentleman who preceded me gave me the cue.

I am getting many letters and telegrams from home. Perhaps it is because I am a new man, but I think I have never seen so much excitement in this country as there is over this Court issue. Men whom I have known for years, men who have faith in me, are writing now that they doubt my sanity, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Chairman, there are two great characteristics of our Government brought into discussion by the President's recent proposal. One of these characteristics is the division of power in our dual form of government between the local units, the States, and the Central Government. Mr. Chairman, I feel that we are inevitably being driven in the direction of centralized power here in the national structure. I believe it is as inevitable as the sunrise. You might as well try to put out the fires of the sun by spitting at it as to stop this centralization. I know the political parties have reversed their attitudes in regard to it. Every achievement of science, communication, travel, and the spreading of thought has dimmed State boundary lines and increased the necessity of control from this central source of authority. I am in favor of this change because I believe it is inevitable. I recognize, of course, that there are dangers and that it may proceed too far and too fast, but it must proceed.

Another great feature of our form of government is the threefold separation of power into legislative, executive, and judicial. I believe this tripartite division of power was a wise one, and I am not in favor of changing it. We are up against this proposition right now. I would not take away from the Supreme Court of the United States the power of judicial review. Some of my friends, perhaps with more knowledge than I have, are saying: "Let us give Congress power by a two-thirds vote to override a judicial veto." I am not in favor of it. I would not give the lawmaking body of this country the last word even by unanimous vote. If you do that, you might as well junk the Constitution. If you do that you might as well depart from the American constitutional form of government and go over directly to the English system of parliamentary government. I have great respect for my English cousins across the way, but I am not willing to accept their form instead of ours.

So long as we have a written constitution, there must be somebody to serve as referee; somebody to say, if the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, whether any law passed by this or any other lawmaking body is in conformity or in disagreement with it. If we take away this power from the Court, we change fundamentally our Constitution, do we not? I for one am not in favor of doing so.

But here is our dilemma. Some of my friends said to me the other day when I made my maiden speech: "Why do you not propose an amendment of the Constitution?" I think that would be a way out of the dilemma; certainly that is one way out; but, Mr. Chairman, how long will it take? Yesterday was Susan B. Anthony's birthday. We honored her for success in a great crusade. Her success was won after her generation had passed from the scene.

I want to remind you that 50 years before the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted she wrote the wording exactly as it is today. Assuming that it was right, fair, just, and desirable that the women of America be given the ballot in 1870 and that it was the will of the American people, it took a half century to get that written into fundamental law.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. If what the gentleman has stated is true, may I ask him, is it not also true that the American people have always amended their Constitution when the majority of the American people wanted to do so?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Yes; occasionally and in the course of time; but how long does it take?

Mr. MICHENER. Just as soon as they want to amend it. They have the power to do so right away.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, during the last 4 years of the Roosevelt administration the entire energy of the administration has been taken up fighting a terrible depression. We are now out of the depression or at least partly out. What are we going to do during the next 4 years? Must we amend the Constitution or is there, safely, another way?

I am a new Member of Congress. I came here hoping to work with the Members of Congress and with the President and the courts to go forward with law making in advancing the progress of this country. But can we do it? All that I have seen since I came here has been bills appropriating sums of money. We seem powerless to legislate constructively for present needs.

We have reached an alarming point in our national debt. Are we going to continue to deal out money to keep people from starving, or are we going to promote legislation that will get this country back into a prosperous economic condition? I believe that we can no longer let things slide as they have been doing in the last 40 or 50 years. We must act and act quickly.

Those of us who were chosen last November and feel that we have a clear mandate from the people to lead in the general direction of New Deal policies now find ourselves in this dilemma: That the Constitution, as now interpreted, will not permit the legislation which we need, and, on the other hand, there is little probability that a constitutional amendment could possibly be adopted within the next 4 or 5 years. This administration, then, must either find some practical way of carrying out our pledge to the American people or recognize our impotency to do more than appropriate money to keep people from starving. Although it is only as a very last resort and as a dire expedient that I can bring myself to favor enlarging the personnel of the Supreme Court, nevertheless I shall consent to that change in personnel rather than accept the alternatives; and what do I mean by these alternatives?

The alternatives are that we shall let the next few years of golden opportunity to legislate progressively for our country pass because of our impotency, or we shall fritter away this golden opportunity and these strategic years trying to get a more emphatic and unmistakable mandate from the people through an amendment, which struggle for amendment may be in vain, so far as the next few significant years are concerned.

I, too, dislike being dubbed a "rubber stamp." I deny that I rode into office on Roosevelt's coattail. I resent the charge or implication that I am subservient to the President, because I find myself agreeing in large part with his proposals and agreeing with him absolutely in what I understand to be his national objectives. By thus agreeing with this great "prophet of a new day", I feel that I am not subservient to one man but subservient to the will of the American people.

I trust the President and cannot bring myself to give any credence to the charge that he is attempting to become a dictator. While I can see some danger of the President's controlling the high court through a certain use of appointive power, at least there is nothing unconstitutional about it. On the other hand, I see even greater danger for this country in our legislative supineness and impotency caused by the Court's medieval interpretation of the Constitution. This might conceivably bring about such a state of affairs in this country as can only be dealt with by extra-legal or revolutionary means. We can lose our liberties through a single dictatorship, and just as surely through a plural dictatorship. God forbid that we shall do it either way. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER].

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I requested these few minutes to perhaps talk about something that should be very interesting to the Members, the money question. However, before I start I want to make myself clear on the proposal of the President to change the membership of the Supreme Court.

I have heard a great deal of talk here about the President's wanting to be a dictator over the Supreme Court. There are a great many here who are against any proposal to change the Supreme Court. Why? Because you do not want any progressive legislation passed in this Congress which will get out to the people of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that there are 9,000,000 people out of employment at the present time, and there are many million farmers on relief in this Nation. All the progressive legislation that has been proposed and passed by this Congress since I have been a Member the last 2 years has been vetoed by those nine old men over there in the Supreme Court. If there is any other way to remedy the situation, then let us remedy it. Let us put in a few men who will act for the people of this Nation instead of having four or five over there who want to act for and protect the big special interests in the eastern part of this Nation to the detriment of the people of the whole Nation. Perhaps that is enough on that. I am going to support the President on his proposition, and I have attempted to tell you the reasons why. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska talked to you this morning for some time about the money situation. For me or anyone to talk to you about the money situation and the control of the money of this Nation would be like trying to wake up Rip Van Winkle and talking to him, because you will not listen.

Four years ago the President said he was going to run the money changers out of the temple. In fact, I thought he had run them out for a while, but the rascals have come back.

I believe the Federal Government should take over the Federal Reserve Banking System and control the money and credit for all the people of the Nation. That is not against the Constitution, because the Constitution specifically states the Congress should do that.

Along last fall and lately again the Federal Reserve bank officials have raised the reserves which the banks should have, to stop what? They say to stop the gamblers down here on the New York Stock Exchange. If that is true, why penalize 130,000,000 people on account of a few rascals down here on the stock exchange and try to prevent them from gambling with other people's money? I say put them out of business.

Some people have said we have the Securities Exchange Commission to regulate the stock exchange. But that reminds me of a law that was passed up in North Dakota a few years ago. The gophers over there got to be so numerous that they started to eat up some of the crops. The legislature passed a bill providing for a bounty to be paid for gophers. Of course, the farmers went to trapping the gophers. All they had to do was to take the tail of the gopher to the auditor and get the money. Later on it was found out that the farmers were turning the gophers loose. The farmers then were asked why they were turning these gophers loose, because they only had one tail, and they had already been paid for that. The farmers replied: "I know, but he will go out and raise more gophers with tails."

That is just about the way the Securities Exchange Commission regulates the stock exchange up there in New York.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman, but I only have 10 minutes.

Mr. FORD of California. Is the gentleman sure that is exactly the way the Securities Exchange Commission regulates the Stock Exchange in New York?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. That is the experience we have had since they have been trying to do the job.

Talking about the control of money by the Federal Reserve banks, you will remember that back in 1920 the same Federal Reserve bank—not the same persons, perhaps, but they belonged to the same outfit—took the money out of circulation, and it broke most all the farmers and small bankers of the Northwest. This was because the Federal Reserve had taken all the money and credit out of circulation and we have not received any credit from the bankers since that time in the agricultural districts.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I want to ask that the gentleman be yielded more time.

Mr. TABER. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I should like to have about 5 minutes more.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 more minutes.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has more time. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. No; I have only 5 minutes more, and I want to use it myself. In 1920, when they took the money out of circulation, they said money was too cheap and the produce of the farmer was too high. Of course, when the money went out of circulation you remember what happened to the farmer. His produce went down to about one-half, and in some cases less than one-third, and this broke the farmer and the small banker in this Nation.

The same Federal Reserve Board threw this money into the big centers and into Wall Street and they started to gamble on stocks and bonds after they had unloaded and sold the stocks and bonds to the people. You know what happened in 1929. They raised the interest rate up to 10 or 15 percent in order to take the money out of circulation again, and they fleeced the people of the Nation by that operation out of $50,000,000,000.

Of course, when you took the money out of circulation in 1929 you broke the people of the Nation, and I contend you are on the same road now when you are allowing these Federal Reserve bank officers to take the money of the country out of circulation. This causes the banks to hold a larger surplus and head us toward a panic like the one in 1929. The banks in the agricultural districts have never lent out a great deal of money since the panic of 1920 to the farmers of the Nation, because they have been skeptical of the Federal Reserve banks, but just recently they have started to do a little business. Now, you have frozen the assets of the country banks and you are going right back to where you were in 1929 and you are headed for another panic. Do we have to rely on the gamblers in the stock exchange for our prosperity?

If they are taking the money out of circulation in order to curtail the New York Stock Exchange, I contend you could put them out of business because less than 1 percent of the corporations and business concerns of the country do business on the stock exchange. There are just a few big concerns listed on the stock exchange in order to gamble and rob the people, or if this is not the reason then it is the high interest rates they are looking for. They are looking to get more interest, and I want to say to you right now that if you are going to get out of the condition you are in you have got to have cheap interest. You cannot raise the interest rates if you expect the people to get out of the conditions which they find themselves in at the present time.

You also know that it takes all the farmers can produce to pay the interest on their mortgages and the public debt. Therefore, you have got to keep the interest rate down if you are going to get out from under this private and public debt. [Applause.]

If the Nation would have wanted to go back to Hoover they would have elected Landon and gone back to the gold standard. Then we would have high interest rates and cheap prices for agricultural produce. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, at this time, when the Nation is aroused, when it has become thoroughly water conscious and is contemplating the appalling human and property losses occasioned by last year's and the present flood, I wish to call the attention of Congress to House bill 4269, a bill that I have introduced in this session of Congress to take the place of a similar bill which I had introduced in the last session. This bill provides for a practical solution of our ever-occurring flood problems. It at the same time conserves and makes use of the unappropriated waters for the people of this Nation. These waters are now wasted and permitted to run to the ocean, leaving destruction and misery in their wake.

This bill has for its object and purpose not only the prevention of the destruction of millions of dollars' worth of property, together with human lives, by uncontrolled waters but also the prevention of drought and the restoration of water levels in the Dust Bowl. Few Members of Congress perhaps realize that our loss in crops, livestock, and other property caused by drought is many times greater than that occasioned by recent floods. For every million dollars' worth of property lost by floods at least fifty million has been lost in recent years by drought.

This bill provides:

That for the purpose of impounding, storing, conserving, and making use of the unappropriated waters falling or emanating within the United States, and to provide for navigability of streams within the United States, constructing canals for transportation purposes, preventing floods, restoring ground water and water levels, lessening soil erosion, aiding in forestation of cut-over and other uncultivable lands, water for irrigation, creating opportunities for home building and industrial development, developing electricity for light and power, and furnishing employment to the unemployed, there is hereby created a Commission to be known as the Water Conservation and Flood Control Commission, hereinafter referred to as the Commission, which Commission shall be deemed legally organized and created on the date that this act goes into effect.

This commission is not composed of new members, does not, in fact, create a new bureau for political favorites, but makes use of the heads of existing departments of government who have been and are already, in one way or another, connected with water conservation or flood control.

The bill provides that—

The Commission shall be composed of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Labor, the Attorney General, the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, the Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the President of the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration. The Secretary of the Interior shall be chairman, and the Secretary of Labor secretary of the Commission. The members of the Commission as such shall receive no additional salaries. They shall, however be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission by this act. The Commission shall direct the exercise of all the powers of the Commission, and a majority shall constitute a quorum.

As we have already seen, this bill provides for the impounding near their source of the unused and uncontrolled floodwaters coming from the mountain slopes and emanating in the interior of the United States in such a way as to prevent drought by supplying humidity to the atmosphere and causing rains in the Dust Bowl, and at the same time providing water storage and preventing disastrous floods in the lower Mississippi Valley and in other valleys. This at a low cost and on a permanent basis. While furnishing flood protection, so necessary during the occasions of unusually high waters, the project outlined in this bill is one which will make use of these waters and serve many other important purposes and pay rich dividends 365 days in the year.

Only those who live in the central part of the United States know that the great American desert is on its way. Few people know to what extent ground waters and water supplies have disappeared between the Continental Divide and the Mississippi River. Do you know that in the last 5 years about one-fourth of the livestock in these regions was either sold or died of thirst and starvation because of a lack of water and moisture? Do you know that in some instances farmers hauled water 30, 40, and 50 miles for household use and for livestock? Do you know that hundreds and thousands of cattle died because they ate the dust-covered grass—that human beings not only choked in dust storms but died because they inhaled dust?

In every State west of the Mississippi and east of the Continental Divide ground waters and water levels have fallen from 10 to 48 feet since 1878. North Dakota in 1878 had 5,000 lakes, ponds, and water holes. Today less than 50 of these are left. At that time Devil's Lake was 35 feet deep and covered over 135 square miles. It was 60 miles long, with a steamboat running from Devil's Lake to Minnewaukan. Today it is less than 6 feet deep and covers less than 6 square miles.

In Minnesota 5,600 lakes, sloughs, ponds, and water holes have gone dry since 1878. What is true of North Dakota and Minnesota is equally true of South Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and the other States in this region. Some of these did not have as many lakes, therefore there were less that went dry.

What I said about the lakes, sloughs, ponds, and water holes is equally true of the small streams. Nearly all of these have either gone completely dry or flow only for a few weeks in the springtime. Even the larger streams, such as the Yellowstone, the Missouri, the Red, and the James Rivers, have decreased in volume. These streams used to flow the entire year, but now they are filled for only a short period during the spring when the snow melts, and after that either become dry or so low that a person can wade across them at almost any point. In the last few years I have seen farmers attempt to raise vegetables in the bed of the James River—the attempt was unsuccessful because there was not enough moisture in the river bed.

What I have said about ground waters and water supply between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi River is equally true between the western slope of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean. Here, too, ground waters and water levels have fallen some 18 feet or more within recent years. The same condition exists in many States east of the Mississippi River. In fact hundreds and thousands of lakes, sloughs, ponds, swamps, and water holes in the interior of the United States have disappeared within the last 75 years. The Nation has truly gone dry in spite of the recent floods.

I have presented these facts to show you that this is a national, not a local issue. It is a serious and an alarming situation. It concerns every State and the very life and welfare of this Nation. The floods and the drought have become a national catastrophe. The regret is that we should permit the water that during the summer months is so badly needed, to go not only to waste, but to allow it to destroy millions upon millions of dollars' worth of property, and in addition, human life. We should have long ago harnessed this water for human use at its source where it is needed, in place of letting it go on a rampage.

The reason for the recent floods is that by cultivation and drainage we have destroyed the natural reservoirs and water basins, as well as the grass and timber that held its mad rush to the ocean in check. In other words, the water caused by recent rains and melting snow, rushed unchecked over the frozen ground into the smaller streams, and then discharged into the main streams. If there had been hundreds and thousands of dams, reservoirs, and catch basins distributed in the flood regions, the surplus waters would then have been caught and stored for use, and the floods prevented.

So, also, the reason for the gradual decrease of the water supply in the larger part of the interior of this Nation is due to the destruction, by cultivation and by the cutting of timber, of the natural water basins and reservoirs and by draining the small lakes, sloughs, ponds, and swamps so as to increase the number of acres in cultivation and thus removing the grass and other vegetation that retains the moisture caused by summer rains and winter snows. In addition to this, our road construction in the level prairie States, with a large ditch on each side, and paralleling one another a mile apart and running east and west, north and south, drained all the surrounding lands into the nearby rivers and streams, that carried it finally into the larger rivers, and which in turn ultimately carried it into the ocean.

We drained the lakes to get more land under cultivation, and now, because of drought and lack of moisture, crops refuse to grow even in the lake bottoms. This was shortsightedness, but the human race is generally short-sighted. The tragedy of all this is fully realized when we learn that in many cases the farmers are still paying special assessments for the drainage ditches that are now being dammed in order to conserve the water by creating artificial lakes and water basins.

Over half of our States have been listed as being in the drought area. It is high time for us to awaken. The cause of this drought, as we have already seen, is due largely to overcultivation, overgrazing, and the drainage of lakes and water basins and road construction in the Great Plains States. Those of us who grew up in these States know that some 50 years ago there were hundreds upon thousands of lakes, rivers, riverlets, creeks, coulees, gullies with an abundance of water everywhere the year around, while today most of these rivers and practically all of these riverlets, creeks, coulees, and gullies have gone dry and are being farmed and cultivated. Many of these lakes and water basins were drained by State and county governments in order to increase the cultivable land.

This damage was done, not deliberately, but because of ignorance of the final result, of the final accounting, so that today water conservation is one of the most-important problems confronting this Nation, ranking in importance over reforestation or forestation, because without water there can be no forests or vegetable life, and in the long run no animal life.

Billions of tons of the soil and fertility of these drought-stricken States have been picked up by the winds and carried across the continent. This because there was no humidity either in the air or in the particles of soil. They became light as feathers. Truly a calamity has befallen these States and this Nation that we cannot as yet fully comprehend. A condition that will not only become permanent, but worse, unless the water tables are restored. Surely a disaster of this magnitude challenges the ingenuity and patriotism of our people. There is no question but that when once we realize the cause of this catastrophe we will and can fully meet it. The American spirit of determination and progress will be equal to the occasion. The deserts will grow smaller and not larger. We will face the issue and not run away from it.

In all of these Plains States, and in fact in every State in the Union, nature has provided us with hundreds and thousands of watersheds and storage basins, which at a very small expense could be turned into hundreds and thousands of lakes, ponds, and reservoirs by building earthen dams at the proper places, so as to catch the water during rains and melting snows. This water, as we have already seen, is now permitted to wander away to the ocean, where it serves no useful purpose. More than that, in its mad rush to reach the ocean it occasions at times great property losses through floods, thus not only leaving the interior where it is needed by plant and animal life but destroying millions of dollars' worth of property and human life in the great river valleys where it is not needed or wanted and, at the same time, making possible the great American desert.

This is both a National and a State problem. The future welfare of both depends upon a proper solution. The Federal and State Governments must cooperate. They must both become water-minded. The larger projects, on the large and principal rivers and streams, must be financed and carried on by the Federal Government. The Federal Government must dam these rivers and must divert some of these waters into the fast-disappearing lakes. The smaller projects, such as putting in small dams to impound the waters in natural watersheds and basins and distributing the water from the large rivers to the smaller riverlets, creeks, coulees, and gullies, must be, and can be, successfully done by the States, in cooperation with the Federal Government.

Section 20 of the bill reads as follows:

The Commission is further directed, in carrying out the provisions of this act, to cooperate with States, counties, municipalities, farmers, farm organizations, and landowners in the construction of dams, ditches, canals, lakes, ponds, water holes, reservoirs, runways, spillways, docks, and locks, and to do all things reasonably necessary and convenient in carrying out the provisions of this act. It shall cooperate and coordinate its work with all other agencies of Government engaged in similar work, and especially with all other agencies or provisions of law enacted for the purposes of controlling and preventing floods and soil erosion.

If this bill becomes a law, the youth of this Nation will be given an opportunity. They will have an opportunity to build homes and pursue agriculture on irrigated lands as well as to enter into industrial fields. Millions will be taken from the dole system. It will give a new frontier to our national aims. It will utilize and save the waters of the Nation where they are needed for irrigation, navigation, and other purposes and add millions and billions to our national wealth. It will harness the rivers and streams at their sources and use them for the good of humanity, rather than to allow them to destroy millions of dollars worth of property and many lives each year.

Section 14 of the bill provides:

The Commission may also establish homesteads by erecting houses and other necessary buildings on lands belonging to the Government and to be irrigated, such homesteads to be used exclusively for agricultural purposes and not to exceed 80 acres each. Such homesteads shall be sold on long terms and at a low rate of interest to heads of families who have lost their farms through drought, mortgage foreclosure, or indebtedness or to tenants or to heads of families who are out of employment and desire to engage in agriculture and furnish the Commission with reasonable evidence of their ability to make good and who have no other means of providing a home or livelihood for their families.

In conclusion, may I state that this bill provides for a standing appropriation of $500,000,000 each year. We now appropriate a billion dollars for the Army and Navy for national defense. Yet the greatest defense to this Nation will be the conservation and the proper use of the waters that fall within the interior. Our most valuable natural possession is water, because of the lack of water, of humidity, and moisture, the great American desert is on its way. Prompt action is necessary. Water conservation and flood control must be carried on on a national scope. We must put in 500,000 lakes, reservoirs, and water basins in the interior of the United States.

By putting in these lakes, water basins, and reservoirs we will restore the ground waters. Trees and vegetation will again become abundant. These in turn will take the ground waters and transmit them in the form of vapor into the air, causing humidity. The humidity will finally get together in the form of raindrops and return to the earth, but to go up again through vapor and again and again to be returned to the earth to further stimulate vegetation growth. The Dust Bowl will be a thing of the past and man will have restored to nature that which he unwittingly took away.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. FORD of California. How does the gentleman figure by his philosophy or by his bill he could dam up nature and its activities, like floods and tornadoes, and so forth? Is there anything in the gentleman's philosophy or in his bill that would stop that?

Mr. LEMKE. If the gentleman will read the bill and my remarks in the RECORD he will find out, and may I say further, that mankind has changed nature many times. For instance, the gentleman's friend and my friend, Luther Burbank, took an orange and a lemon and made a grapefruit out of them and beat nature to it.

Mr. FORD of California. Did he ever make a cyclone out of a tornado?

Mr. LEMKE. I think he did more. Anyway by shooting into them with a cannon we can now break up nature's cyclones, and that is more than nature can do. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the debate on the Supreme Court, and almost invariably there is some speculation as to how long it takes to amend the Constitution of the United States. I have read an enormous amount of literature on this great subject. I do not suppose that any one man can read the extant spoken and written literature now appearing every day in the press of the country, but out of it I have sought to separate the wheat from the chaff as nearly as I could, and it appears to me that the situation is this, in a nutshell: The President of the United States had fashioned a recovery policy which had for its keystones such enactments as the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the National Industrial Recovery Act. Those acts were submitted to the Supreme Court, and that Court determined they did not square with the Constitution, and hence were invalid. There were three courses which the President could thereafter pursue. First, he could abandon his plan. I think the world will agree that the philosophy of defeat does not appear in the vocabulary of President Roosevelt, and it is to be expected that he would not abandon that plan. The next course open to him was to propose one or more constitutional amendments to effectuate his program. The third course was amending the Supreme Court. After investigation of the matter, apparently it was determined that it would either take too long to amend the Constitution of the United States or that an amendment to the organic act when submitted would not pass, and hence they must, by logic, have fallen upon the device of amending the Supreme Court.

It has intrigued me as to why amending the Constitution has been so lightly passed by in view of the fact that the record discloses that it has not taken so long to amend.

First of all, may I say to the majority party that you have been in better condition to bring about an amendment to the Constitution than any party within the past 50 or 60 years. When noses were counted on the 3d of November 1936 my party found that we had the smallest representation in this body since Benjamin Harrison occupied the White House. My party now has the smallest representation in the other end of the Capitol since Franklin Pierce was the Chief Executive of the country. You have 42 of the 48 Governors in this country. In addition, you dominate nearly every State legislature by virtue of the enormous vote polled on the 3d day of November 1936. You could write your own ticket as far as special conventions are concerned, to which resort might be had for the purpose of securing ratification of an amendment to the Constitution. You have everything on your side. Yet you have not availed yourself of the method of amending the Constitution to effectuate your policies. It seems rather strange that we have so idly speculated upon the time it takes to amend the Constitution, coming to the rather general but unfounded conclusion that it would take too long.

I have investigated the matter a little and I thought the House might be interested in this information. Going all the way back to the Bill of Rights, which found its way into the Constitution in 1791, we will take the first 10 amendments as a group, proposed when Washington was President. They were proposed for amendment on the 25th of September 1789, and ratified by the necessary number of States on December 15, 1791. It took 2 years, 2 months, and 20 days to effect ratifications of the first 10 amendments.

If you will make allowance for the fact that we had no radios, that we had no newspapers, that we had no locomotives, that we had no means of communication—that does not appear to be so very long in those days when the country was in a rather pristine condition.

Now, let us come to the eleventh amendment, which was proposed on the 4th of March 1794 and was ratified on February 7, 1795. The eleventh amendment required exactly 339 days to become a part of our Constitution.

The twelfth amendment, dealing with the electoral college, was proposed on the 9th of December 1803 and was ratified in 229 days.

The thirteenth amendment, dealing with a phase of slavery, was ratified in 309 days.

The fourteenth amendment was ratified in 2 years and 26 days.

The fifteenth amendment in 356 days.

The sixteenth amendment, which came in the administration of President Taft, dealing with the income tax, was ratified in 3 years 6 months and 21 days.

The seventeenth amendment, dealing with the direct election of Senators, found its way into the Constitution in 359 days.

The celebrated eighteenth amendment, dealing with prohibition, required 1 year 1 month and 1 day.

The nineteenth amendment, conferring equal suffrage upon women, was ratified at the end of 1 year 2 months and 19 days.

The twentieth amendment, the "lame duck" amendment, was ratified in 10 months, 21 days.

The twenty-first amendment, repealing the eighteenth amendment, was ratified in 9 months and 15 days.

Now, if you will examine those figures, you will find that the amendment which required the longest time provided authority to levy income taxes and took 3 years, 6 months, and 21 days to get into the Constitution; and the shortest time was 229 days, in the case of the twelfth amendment. Seven of the last 11 amendments to the Constitution required less than a year. Nine of the last 11 amendments required less than 15 months. The average for all of the last 11 would be approximately 15⅓ months.

Now, there is the record so far as all amendments to the Constitution are concerned.

When you regard that in the light of the length of time we have been litigating things like the N. R. A., the A. A. A., and many other enactments of the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses, we would have been time ahead if we had resorted to the regular processes of seeking to amend the Constitution rather than to amend the Court.

As I stated at the outset, it seems that the majority party has every attribute by way of heavy representation in this body and in the other body, certainly powerful support in the 48 Commonwealths of the Union, and that you could have achieved these amendments far more expeditiously than resorting to the idea of enlarging the Supreme Court. At a time when there is so much speculation on the subject of the length of time taken to amend our organic act, I think this information will be refreshing, and probably will set at rest a lot of idle speculation as to the allegation that it does take so long.

I appreciate that we live in an age of speed. These are no "horse and buggy" days. We think in terms of automobiles that travel over the highways at 70 or 80 miles an hour. We think of vessels that traverse the ocean in 103 hours; of railroad trains that travel 90 miles an hour for a 1,600-mile round trip, like the Burlington Zephyr. We think of airplane travel in terms of 350 miles an hour. Measured by those standards, perhaps it does take a little longer, yet the record discloses that the average for the last 11 amendments to the Constitution, taking out the first 10 because of lack of communication at that time, required only an average of 15⅓ months.

That indicates so firmly and so emphatically the course that should have been taken in order to write these things into the organic law, that it might stay. I have taken rather fine pride in the fact that I voted for the N. R. A. and voted for the Social Security Act, for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and a great many other measures that were proposed by the President in the hope of lifting this country from the slough of depression to the highroad of sunshine and prosperity. Those days of 1932 and 1933 were troublous and beset with difficulty. Insofar as conviction permitted, one was expected to adjourn all partisanship and participate in the common enterprise of lifting the Nation from its despondency.

Then I went back to my constituency and defended them from the platform. In the light of hindsight, if I had it to do over again, I think my course would be exactly the same, and I would vote for them all over again.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In seeking to take a temperate view of this proposal for judicial reform that is beginning to provoke so much controversy in the country, it seems to me we have overlooked a great bet in not following the regular constitutional lines to write these things into the durable law of the Nation. My observation is that the humblest citizen will regard it a kind of apprehension on the part of the administration to test its policies by submitting them to the people.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has heard the argument concerning the mandate from the people, and the gentleman knows that 46 States went Democratic in the last election. I presume the gentleman has also heard the argument that the reason the constitutional amendment has not been proposed is because 13 States could frustrate its adoption. Is not this a rather peculiar argument when viewed in the light of the mandate of the people in the last election?

Mr. DIRKSEN. We heard much about the concerted effort that was to be made by those who espoused the dry cause to frustrate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment in 1932, yet the opposition failed. The country being minded in the direction of repeal simply rallied to the standard and in the short space of less than 10 months placed repeal in the Constitution. I believe in adapting the legislative policies of this country to meet the forces of change, but at the same time I cherish a decent regard for the traditions of the past, for the wisdom of those who went before us. If this is to remain a government of, by, and for the people, then the people must be consulted by submitting important changes to them in a constitutional way. The record of the past indicates that, in the main, it does not take so long. To change the Court is not the people's way, and only invites ultimate difficulty and disaster.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from New York whether other Members on his side desire time this afternoon?

Mr. TABER. We have no more requests for time today.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ALESHIRE (at the request of Mr. SWEENEY), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. FULLER (at the request of Mr. DRIVER), on account of important business at home, for the week.

To Mr. TERRY (at the request of Mr. DRIVER), for the week, on account of illness.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute for the purpose of asking a question of the majority leader.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, can the majority leader tell us what the program will be for tomorrow?

Mr. RAYBURN. We intend to call the Calendar of Committees tomorrow. No chairman has notified me that he expects to call up a bill. I do not, however, want to ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday. If no bills are considered on the call of the calendar, we shall proceed with general debate on the Treasury-Post Office bill. I have conferred with Members on both sides in charge of time on the Treasury-Post Office bill, and they say that were one committee to take an hour, or something like that, they would still be willing to go ahead with general debate on that bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The Judiciary Committee the other day instructed its chairman to call up all the bills on the calendar.

Mr. RAYBURN. The Judiciary Committee will not be called tomorrow until all the other committees are called.

Mr. MICHENER. Last week on Calendar Wednesday we adjourned unexpectedly about the middle of the afternoon. The Judiciary Committee has not had its full day. If there is no other business tomorrow under the Calendar Wednesday rule, why cannot the Judiciary Committee finish the bills its chairman was instructed to call up?

Mr. RAYBURN. They would have to do that after all the other committees were called. It is possible we might come back to them and start over again. I rather think, however, that some of these other committees may have a bill ready, although they have not notified me. I think the better plan would be to go ahead with the general debate on the Treasury-Post Office bill tomorrow if, on calling the calendar, we find no committees are ready.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein very brief excerpts from an official opinion by the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a chart I used this morning.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, is it not true that under the rule the gentleman must get permission from the Joint Committee on Printing to include a chart in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. If it requires more than two pages, that is the usual practice.

Mr. BINDERUP. It will not take more than two pages.

The SPEAKER. I suggest that the gentleman from Nebraska confer with the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing. I see him in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. BINDERUP. Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request temporarily.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a speech made over the radio on the subject of mandatory neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

(Mr. DIRKSEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks.)

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska renew his request?

Mr. BINDERUP. I withdraw my request temporarily, Mr. Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 17, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

372. By Mr. ARNOLD: Petition of R. V. Jordan, superintendent of schools, Centralia, Ill., expressing opposition to the passage of House bill 30, to protect the artistic and earning opportunity in the United States for American actors, vocal musicians, operatic singers, solo dancers, and orchestral conductors, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

373. By Mr. COLDEN: Resolution adopted by the Harbor District Builders' Supply Association, Long Beach, Calif., urging the enactment of legislation for the continuance of title II of the National Housing Act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

374. By Mr. FISH: Petition of 39 residents and citizens of Goshen, N. Y., protesting against the President's plan to pack and control the Supreme Court, and stating that they believe this is a direct assault upon the liberties of the people of the United States, designed to undermine the independence of the Supreme Court, which is the foremost safeguard of these liberties, and a direct step in the direction of a dictatorship. The obvious effect would be to place in the hands of the Executive the opportunity to appoint as members of the Court creatures of his own, subservient and obedient to his dictation, thus destroying the independence and integrity of the Court, and subverting the purpose it was designed to fulfill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

375. Also, petition of 57 residents and citizens of the town of Goshen, Orange County, N. Y., expressing unqualified condemnation of the plan of President Roosevelt to increase the membership of the Supreme Court, contending that the obvious effect of the proposal would be a direct assault upon the liberties of the people of the United States, designed to undermine the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court and a direct step in the direction of dictatorship, and that it would place in the hands of the Executive the opportunity to appoint as members of the Court creatures of his own, subservient and obedient to his dictation, thus destroying the independence of the Court, and subverting the purpose it was designed to fulfill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

376. Br. Mr. MILLARD: Resolution unanimously adopted by the executive committee of the Republican City Committee of White Plains, N. Y., opposing the proposal of the President to increase the membership of the Supreme Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

377. By Mr. RICH: Petition of citizens of Montoursville, Pa., protesting against the President's recommendation to increase the membership of the Supreme Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

378. Br. Mr. THOMASON of Texas: Petition of the Central Labor Union of the city of El Paso, Tex., endorsing and approving the measures which the President of the United States has requested Congress to adopt amending the structure of the courts of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

379. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Helen Roy and 100 others, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., petitioning Congress to pass no law that would disturb or abridge the religious rights and privileges of all our people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

380. Also, petition of M. G. Patterson and Lloyd R. Brown, opposing any alteration to the Supreme Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1937

(Legislative day of Monday, Feb. 15, 1937)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Monday, February 15, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate:

S. 466. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the White River at or near Eagle Rock, Mo.;

S. 715. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Delaware River near Trenton, N. J.; and

S. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution relating to the participation by the United States in the International Exposition of Paris, 1937.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 77. An act for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmaster at third- and fourth-class post offices;

H. R. 168. An act to authorize an increase in the annual appropriation for books for the adult blind;

H. R. 194. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Brownville, Nebr.;

H. R. 1521. An act to amend the act of February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1053), relative to postal rates on third-class mail matter;

H. R. 1543. An act to amend section 24 of the Immigration Act of 1917, relating to the compensation of certain Immigration and Naturalization Service employees, and for other purposes;

H. R. 1550. An act authorizing a preliminary examination and survey of the Skagway River in the vicinity of Skagway, Alaska;

H. R. 1609. An act to credit laborers in the Postal Service with any fractional part of a year's substitute service toward promotion;

H. R. 1629. An act to provide for a preliminary examination and survey of the Mackinaw River in Illinois with a view to flood control;

H. R. 1972. An act giving superintendents at classified post-office stations credit for substitutes serving under them;

H. R. 2021. An act to provide time credits for substitutes in the motor-vehicle service;

H. R. 2306. An act to authorize the Crew Levick Co., and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it, to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden and State of New Jersey and Petty Island, in said county and State;

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE VICE PRESIDENT CURTIS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table resolutions adopted by the American Indian Federation at their second annual convention at Salt Lake City, Utah, on July 25, 1936, in memory of the late Honorable Charles Curtis, former Vice President of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL

Gathered in second annual convention of the American Indian Federation, we pause to pay tribute to the memory of a distinguished member of our own race whose death brought sorrow to the people of the United States—the late Honorable Charles Curtis.

Charles Curtis, a member of the Kaw Tribe of Indians, was born on the prairies of Kansas in an Indian tepee. Sent to learn the ways of the white man, he suffered all the loneliness, all the heartache and homesickness, all the sufferings of a stranger in a strange land. But he persevered. He studied diligently and worked hard to support himself that he might study more. Great were the rewards of that labor. From a very humble beginning, through his own initiative and efforts, through his determined will to conquer, Charles Curtis arose to the place of Vice President of the United States of America. He won his place of honor as a citizen of the United States. As a citizen, asking no more and no less than any other citizen, he served the people of these United States in public office for almost 40 years, giving to each succeeding office, as Representative, as Senator, and as Vice President, diligent application to duty. Honored and respected for that record of service, all citizens of the United States paused to pay tribute to his memory when, as quietly and unostensibly as he had lived, Charles Curtis departed this life on February 8, 1936.

Joining with all other citizens in our common sorrow at his passing, let it hereby be

Resolved, That we, the members of the American Indian Federation, in second annual convention assembled, do spread upon our records this tribute to the memory of a distinguished member of our race—the late Honorable Charles Curtis. Let us honor his memory for those noble qualities of character which endeared him to all who knew him; let us honor his memory for his record of consciencious public service to the United States. Lastly, let us, his people, honor the memory of Charles Curtis as an Indian citizen who became a leader among the men of today. Let us here resolve that his life shall be as a beacon light guiding our race onward to greater achievements as citizens of the United States; and be it hereby further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the bereaved family of the late Charles Curtis, with expressions of our heartfelt sympathy. May the comforting spirit of our Heavenly Father support and sustain them in their sorrow.

Unanimously adopted by the delegates of the second annual convention of the American Indian Federation.

Dated at Salt Lake City, Utah, this 25th day of July 1936.

JOSEPH BRUNER, National President,
The American Indian Federation.

REPORT OF APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE ON THE INDEPENDENT OFFICES BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
February 17, 1937.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Under the order of the Senate of the 15th instant, Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Appropriations, filed with me, as Secretary of the Senate, on that day the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, with amendments and an accompanying report (No. 92) thereon.

Very truly yours,

EDWIN A. HALSEY, Secretary.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman, Senate Military Affairs Committee.

FARM TENANCY (H. DOC. NO. 149)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Special Committee on Farm Tenancy.

The facts presented in this report reveal a grave problem of great magnitude and complexity. The American dream of the family-size farm, owned by the family which operates it, has become more and more remote. The agricultural ladder, on which an energetic young man might ascend from hired man to tenant to independent owner, is no longer serving its purpose.

Half a century ago one of every four farmers was a tenant. Today 2 of every 5 are tenants, and on some of our best farm lands 7 of every 10 farmers are tenants. All told, they operate land and buildings valued at $11,000,000,000.

For the past 10 years the number of new tenants every year has been about 40,000. Many tenants change farms every 2 or 3 years, and apparently 1 out of 3 changes farms every year. The agricultural ladder for these American citizens has become a treadmill.

At the same time owners of family-size farms have been slipping down. Thousands of farmers commonly considered owners are as insecure as tenants. The farm owner-operator's equity in his property is, on hteaverage, 42 percent, and in some of our best farming sections is as little as one-fifth.

When fully half the total farm population of the United States no longer can feel secure, when millions of our pecple have lost their roots in the soil, action to provide security is imperative and will be generally approved.

A problem of such magnitude is not solved overnight, nor by any one limited approach, nor by the Federal Government alone. While aggravated by the depression, the tenancy problem is the accumulated result of generations of unthinking exploitation of our agricultural resources, both land and people. We can no longer postpone action. We must begin at once with such resources of manpower, money, and experience as are available, and with such methods as will call forth the cooperative effort of local, State, and Federal agencies of government, and of landlords quite as much as tenants. In dealing with the problem of relief among rural people during the depression, we have already accumulated information and experience which will be of great value in the long-time program. It will be wise to start the permanent program on a scale commensurate with our resources and experience, with the purpose of later expanding the program to a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the problem as rapidly as our experience and resources will permit.

The Special Committee on Farm Tenancy emphasizes the necessity for action of at least four types: First, action to open the doors of ownership to tenants who now have the requisite ability and experience, but who can become owners only with the assistance of liberal credit on long terms and technical advice; second, modest loans with the necessary guidance and education to prevent small owners from slipping into tenancy, and to help the masses of tenants, croppers, and farm laborers at the very bottom of the agricultural ladder increase their standards of living, achieve greater security, and begin the upward climb toward land ownership; third, the retirement by public agencies of land proved to be unsuited for farming, and assistance to the families living thereon in finding homes on good land; fourth, cooperation with State and local agencies of government to improve the general leasing system. These activities which bear such close relation to each other should furnish a sound basis for the beginning of a program for improving the present intolerable condition of the lowest income farm families.

The Committee has very properly emphasized the importance of health and education in any long-time program for correcting the evils from which this large section of our population suffers. Attention is also called to the part which land speculation has played in bringing insecurity into the lives of rural families, and to the necessity for eliminating sharp fluctuations in land value due to speculative activity in farm lands.

The attack on the problem of farm tenancy and farm security is a logical continuation of the agricultural program this administration has been developing since March 4, 1933. Necessarily, whatever program the Congress devises will have to be closely integrated with existing activities for maintaining farm income and for conserving and improving our agricultural resources.

Obviously, action by the States alone and independently cannot cure the widespread ill. A Nation-wide program under Federal leadership and with the assistance of States, counties, communities, and individuals is the only solution. Most Americans believe that our form of Government does not prohibit action on behalf of those who need help.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 16, 1937.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the clerks, through the Chair, if the report to which the President's message refers has been sent to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is now on the table.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the report be published as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The message, with the accompanying report, will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RESERVATION OF LANDS FOR INDIANS OF MONTANA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to reserve certain public-domain lands for the use and benefit of the Chippewa, Cree, and other Indians of Montana, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

OFFENSES AGAINST PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, recommending the enactment of proposed legislation in respect to offenses against property in the District of Columbia, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PROPOSED CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of Nevada, transmitting certified copy of a joint resolution of the legislature of that State, ratifying the so-called child-labor amendment to the Constitution, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEVADA,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Carson City, February 10, 1937.

Hon. JOHN NANCE GARNER,
Vice President, President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Complying with the provisions of senate joint resolution no. 1, approved February 1, 1937, I have the honor to transmit herewith certified copy of such resolution ratifying on behalf of the State of Nevada the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I have the honor to be,
Sincerely yours,

RICHARD KIRMAN,
Governor of Nevada.

Senate Joint Resolution 1, ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States

Whereas both Houses of the Fifty-eighth Congress of the United States of America, by constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution:

" 'ARTICLE —

" 'SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

" 'SEC. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article, except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by Congress.' "

Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Nevada (the assembly concurring), That the said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same is hereby, ratified by the Legislature of the State of Nevada. That certified copies of this preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the Governor of this State to the President of the United States and the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY ON RECENT FLOOD DISASTERS

Mr. MOORE presented a letter of sympathy transmitted to him on the recent flood disasters, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OMNIUM MINIER,
Paris, January 28, 1937.

JOS. DIXON CRUCIBLE CO.,
Jersey City, N. J., U. S. A.

DEAR SIRS: The board of directors of our company, on reading of the dreadful floods which ravage your country, wish to say how deeply they feel for you in your terrible distress and send you the expression of their sad sympathy.

L. BAUER, President.
P. VOGT, Managing director.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GLASS rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands from the RECORD that it was tacitly understood that today the independent offices appropriation bill would be taken up for consideration. So the Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia, with the view of having him yield for the presentation of memorials and petitions, the introduction of bills, the submission of reports of committees, and other routine business.

Mr. GLASS. That is satisfactory to me.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Arkansas and the House of Representatives of the State of Arkansas (a majority of all members elected to each house agreeing thereto)—

Whereas House bill No. 4214, introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States by Representative COLMER, of Mississippi, provides for the collection of all excise taxes and sales taxes upon merchandise moving in interstate commerce which would be payable upon such merchandise in the State to which the same is consigned, except that such merchandise moves in interstate commerce; and

Whereas such bill is now pending in the United States Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That we hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, said House bill 4214, by COLMER;

That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to Representative COLMER.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the President of the United States has requested the Congress to authorize additional Justices of the Supreme Court in certain instances; and

Whereas the purpose of this request is to provide assistance to the Court and prevent delay and obstruction in the administration of justice; and

Whereas the effect of this proposal will be to hasten those urgently needed governmental and economic reforms demanded by the people which have been obstructed by the political and economic opinions of certain present Supreme Court Justices; and

Whereas the public welfare has suffered almost irreparable harm as a result of decisions denying the protection of labor legislation to the worker, abolishing the assistance given farmers, and otherwise placing legal technicality above the general welfare; and

Whereas the action proposed by the President would remedy this condition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the house of representatives concur), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania hereby calls upon the Congress of the United States, and in particular the Representatives of Pennsylvania in the Congress, to vote in the affirmative upon this question to the end that justice may be served and the principles of democracy may prevail in the Federal Union; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to all Members of the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Scottish Rite Luncheon Club, of Syracuse, N. Y., the Dimmit County (Tex.) Bar Association, and the Marshall (Tex.) Rotary Club, protesting against the proposed enlargement of the Supreme Court of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the memorial of the faculties of University College and the College of Engineering of New York University, New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against any legislative action which would reduce the power or lessen the independence and prestige of the Supreme Court of the United States or alter the balance between the judicial and other departments of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the New York Branch of the Eastern and Gulf Sailors' Association, Inc., favoring the passage of certain pending legislation for the welfare of seamen, and protesting against the passage of certain other legislation relative to seamen, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Federation of Labor and Local Union No. 3, Branch 1, Brewery Workers, of Flint, Mich., favoring an investigation of the Trolley Coach Co. strike at Flint, Mich., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by United Auto Workers Local, No. 171, of Anderson, Ind., protesting against mob violence in Anderson, Ind., in connection with a strike of automobile workers in that city, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the Medical and Chirurgical Faculty of Maryland, Baltimore, Md., favoring the making of an adequate appropriation for the library of the Surgeon General's Office of the War Department, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of several citizens of Jewell, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation placing star mail routes under continuous contract rather than competitive bidding, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BULKLEY presented the petition of Daniel F. Stocker and sundry other citizens being commanders and presidents of various veteran organizations, together with members of the Ohio Soldiers' and Sailors' Home, all of Sandusky, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 59) to establish the Bureau of Veterans' Affairs in the Department of the Treasury with the Commissioner of Veterans' Affairs at the head thereof, to abolish the Veterans' Administration and transfer its functions to such Bureau, to adjust and equalize pensions of veterans and widows and dependents of veterans, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McNARY presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

House Joint Memorial 2

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully represent that:

Whereas the United States Government under the Emergency Federal Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, and with subsequent amendments, was authorized to grant commissioner loans to any one farmer not exceeding the sum of $7,500; and

Whereas the rate of interest on such loans was established at the rate of 5 percent per annum; and

Whereas most of these loans were made for a period of 13 years with no payment required on principal during the first 3 years of said loan; and

Whereas the principal of said loan, in most cases is payable during the following 10 years, one-tenth each year, plus interest at the rate of 5 percent per annum on unpaid balances; and

Whereas the income from farm crops is not sufficient in most cases to meet such payments; and

Whereas the rate of interest paid on most of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds, through which the Government farm loan, known as Land Bank Commissioner loans, were financed, bear interest at the rate of less than 3 percent per annum: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein) that the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon hereby does petition the Congress of the United States to enact into law some legislation providing that Land Bank Commissioner mortgages of record or made hereafter, shall be amortized over a term of years, so that the payment of principal and interest shall not be greater than 5 percent of the amount of the original loan, with interest on the unpaid balance not to exceed the rate of 3 percent per annum; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon is hereby directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, Washington, D. C., a copy to each Representative and Senator from the State of Oregon, also a copy hereof to the speaker of the house and president of the senate of each State legislature in the United States which shall convene during the year 1937.

Mr. POPE presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Honorable SECRETARY OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that:

Whereas there is now established an airway route between the cities of Great Falls, in the State of Montana, and Salt Lake City, in the State of Utah, over which the National Parks Airways is now and for several years has been carrying mail, passengers and express between said cities and intermediate points in the State of Idaho, and

Whereas to promote safety in the operation of aircraft along the route of said airway, it is necessary and proper that radio range stations be established within the State of Idaho, and

Whereas said airway is a connecting link between two great transcontinental airways and as such is of great importance for commercial purposes and for national defense in time of war and is in every way necessary for public use and convenience: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho (the senate concurring), That we earnestly request the United States Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Air Commerce in said department, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of radio range stations at proper and necessary points within the State of Idaho; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of Idaho be and he is hereby instructed to forward this memorial to the Secretary of Commerce of the United States at Washington, D. C., and that copies hereof be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Idaho.

Mr. BONE presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Petitioning the Government of the United States to enter into a treaty with the Government of the Kingdom of Japan to protect the salmon industry of Alaska

To the Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President.

The Honorable CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State of the United States of America:

Whereas the failure of the Governments of Russia and Japan to reach an agreement on the further taking of fish by the Japanese people in waters under the control of the Russian Government has created a situation which may effect the interests of the United States; and

Whereas the Government of Japan has sent fisheries research vessels into the water of Bering Sea, Bristol Bay, and the area of waters of the north Pacific Ocean presumably with the purpose of finding a future supply of fish; and

Whereas such research and test work has taken place within the proximity of the 3-mile limit of the coast of the Territory of Alaska and indicates a definite intention to invade waters just beyond the 3-mile limit; and

Whereas such commercial fishing in such close proximity to the coast of the Territory of Alaska will definitely diminish the run of fish to their natural spawning grounds in the rivers and streams which flow from the Territory of Alaska into the Pacific Ocean, thereby endangering if not entirely destroying future salmon industry; and

Whereas an international treaty or trade agreement is urgently needed between the Governments of the United States and the Kingdom of Japan to define and make clear the mutual obligations which must be brought into existence for the permanent future protection of the salmon runs: Therefore

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, pray that such treaty as will protect the future salmon runs, thereby safeguarding the basic industry of Alaska, be negotiated without extended delay between the United States Government and the Government of the Kingdom of Japan.

Mr. NYE presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the financial distress, particularly among the agricultural people of this Nation, continues unabated; and

Whereas the farm-loan facilities are entirely inadequate and out of harmony with similar facilities available to industry; and

Whereas no one in public service seems to have suggested a plan for the relief of this distress, or adjustment of these differences better than the Frazier-Lemke refinance plan as now contained in H. R. 213, introduced in the House of Representatives of the National Congress on January 5, 1937, by the Honorable WILLIAM LEMKE, of North Dakota: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota:

1. That we, and through us, the people of North Dakota do hereby appeal to the President of the United States and to all earnest, fair-minded Members of Congress to give their active support to said measure to the end that the same may be enacted into law with the least possible delay.

2. That we hereby extend our thanks, and through us, the thanks of the people of this State, to the North Dakota Representatives in Congress who have given their support to this and similar acts, and particularly to Representative LEMKE for his untiring efforts in behalf of similar legislation during the past several years.

3. That a copy of this resolution be mailed to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and to each Representative in Congress from North Dakota.

(Mr. NYE also presented an identical resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.)

Mr. NYE also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the adoption of the so-called Townsend old-age-pension plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 15th instant, p. 1192, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. NYE also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, protesting against the ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. FRAZIER on the 15th instant, p. 1193, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

PROPOSED REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I present a letter embodying a resolution adopted by the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of North America in convention assembled at Gary, Ind., endorsing the President's proposal concerning the Supreme Court.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

GENTLEMEN: The following letter is self-explanatory. We urge you to support our President in the reorganization of the Federal courts of the United States.

FEBRUARY 11, 1937.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President, United States of America,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT: When our great Nation was confronted with an economic distress most acute in the history of our country, as servants of the American people you and Congress responded to the call of need, but the Federal judiciary group made a miserable failure in their duty. It proves that the Federal courts set-up, as it now stands, is wholly inadequate and incompetent to serve the best interests of all the people.

Therefore, we, the representatives of lodges of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of North America, speaking for over 100,000 steel workers in the Calumet area, who have voted for you, expecting you to finish the vast undertaking of economic readjustment, highly commend and support you in the move to reorganize the Federal courts of the United States.

Adopted in convention assembled at the Moose Hall, Gary, Ind.

Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of North America: Lodge No. 64, Chicago Heights, Ill., president, Louis Gromola, secretary, Serafiro Fonwertin; Lodge No. 65, South Chicago, Ill., president, James Stewart, secretary, Chas. Jankus; Lodge No. 1007, Chicago, Ill., president, James G. Thimmes, secretary, John F. Lipton; Lodge No. 1008, South Chicago, Ill., president, Joseph Germeno, secretary, Arthur Lutgen; Lodge No. 1009, Gary, Ind., president, C. A. Mansfield, secretary, Glen Finch; Lodge No. 1010, Indiana Harbor, Ind., president, Wm. Thomor, secretary, James C. Johnsen; Lodge No. 1011, Indiana Harbor, Ind., president, Joseph Gist, secretary, Nicholas Gnusby; Lodge No. 1014, Gary, Ind., president, Joe Goin, secretary, Ernest P. Griesel; Lodge No. 1026, East Chicago, Ind., president, Nicholas Custis, secretary, Dave Morris; Lodge No. 1027, Chicago Heights, Ill., president, Martin Nelson; Lodge No. 1029, South Chicago, Ill., president, Joseph A. Cook, secretary, Daniel Graff, Jr.; Lodge No. 1033, South Chicago, Ill., president, Gust Yuratovil, secretary, Frank Rucker; Lodge No. 1050, Harvey, Ill., president, Theo Retzloff, secretary, Sam Calpino; Lodge No. 1052, Chicago, Ill., president, Chas. H. Kroll, secretary, Joseph H. REPEAL OF OIL AND GASOLINE TAXES

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I present 12 resolutions adopted by County Petroleum Industries Committees in my State, favoring immediate repeal of the Federal gasoline and lubricating-oil taxes, which I ask may be noted in the RECORD and appropriately referred. I also ask that one of the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance, and one of the resolutions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mason County Petroleum Industries Committee—Resolution

Whereas the motorists and oil and automotive industries are overburdened with excessive taxation in the State of West Virginia to such an extent it is very doubtful if the thousands of our citizens depending on these industries for their livelihood can find it possible to continue to contribute to National and State recovery as they would like and as they should be in position to do so: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That our two United States Senators and the district's Congressman be requested to use their vote and influence toward the immediate repeal of the Federal gasoline and lubricating-oil taxes and leave this field of taxation to the individual States, as was understood and agreed in 1932 at the time the Federal tax was imposed as an emergency measure; be it further

Resolved, That our State senators and delegates be requested to oppose all added taxes on the motorists and oil and automotive industries.

B. W. KRODEL, Chairman.
INEZ BARNETTE, Temporary Secretary.

POINT PLEASANT, February 5, 1937.

Adopted by signature of a majority of the members of the executive committee.

HENRY H. SHINN,
Secretary, West Virginia Petroleum Industries Committee.

The resolutions favoring the immediate repeal of Federal gasoline and lubricating-oil taxes, presented by Mr. HOLT and referred to the Committee on Finance, are from the Petroleum Industries Committees of the counties of Fayette, Greenbrier, Jackson, Jefferson, Kanawha, Lincoln, Ritchie, Roane, Wayne, Wood, and Wyoming, in the State of West Virginia.

PUBLIC CONSTRUCTION WORK AND W. P. A. ACTIVITIES

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations a resolution adopted by the Scranton-Lackawanna Valley Master Plumbers Association relating to the W. P. A.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Scranton-Lackawanna Valley Master Plumbers Association, at the regular meeting of February 11, 1937, held at Scranton, Pa.; and a copy of which is to be forwarded to each of our Pennsylvania national Senators and our Representatives of the Eleventh Congressional District, respectfully requesting their good efforts toward its enactment

Whereas the construction industry has absorbed skilled building trades workers, other than those engaged on W. P. A. projects, and at the present time there is a shortage of skilled mechanics; and

Whereas the construction industry was hit harder during the depression than any other line of endeavor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we ask Congress and the President to terminate W. P. A. activities in order that the large volume of public construction may be returned to private industry in order that private employees and nonrelief workers may be permitted to share in the work on public construction, through work let at contract to the lowest responsible bidder; be it further

Resolved, That we object to the Government being a competitor to private industry on construction work.

PROGRAM OF COUNCIL FOR INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask that the four-point program of the President's Council for Industrial Progress, which I send to the desk, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the program was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Production control: The committee declares its belief in an economy of abundance and therefore considers unwise and ineffective any attempt to solve unemployment by the limitation of production, whether imposed by government or accomplished through voluntary agreements in industry. The committee recognizes the need, under emergency conditions, of instituting production control when that may be necessary to prevent the destruction of socially useful values.

2. Hours and wages: While recognizing the need to maintain the respective fields of State and Federal authority, the committee advocates the policy of a minimum wage in industry and the payment of substantial overtime rates for hours worked in excess of a reasonable workweek, believing this to be an advisable national policy tending to increase the purchasing power of wage earners, and make for reemployment in an age of continuous technological improvement.

3. Trade practices: The committee believes that our national industrial policy should give proper recognition to the need for curbing these unfair competitive practices which are destructive of the public interest in the maintenance of a free and open market for the sale and distribution of goods.

4. Permanent advisory council: The committee believes there should be instituted by the National Government a continuing study of the national income; the source from which it springs, the channels through which it flows, the uses to which it is put, and the forces which cause it to periodically form and freeze into vast pools of disuse, causing the stagnation and paralysis of industry and bringing unemployment and suffering to the people.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

TENURE AND COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN JUDGES

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce a joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment relating to the tenure in office and compensation of judges of the Supreme and inferior courts. I ask unanimous consent that before its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary it may be read by the clerk.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) proposing an amendment to article III, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States relating to the tenure in office and compensation of judges of the Supreme and inferior courts, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to article III, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, relating to the tenure in office and compensation of judges of the Supreme and inferior courts

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, in lieu of article III, section 1, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE III

"SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and upon reaching the age of 70 years any such judge may retire, and upon reaching the age of 75 years every such judge shall retire. Said judges shall at stated times receive a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office nor during their period of retirement.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 82) was read, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has presented to Congress a message bearing upon the judiciary and judicial reform, and has made reference to the delays surrounding the administration of justice and the inequality, uncertainty, and delay in the disposition of vital questions of constitutionality arising under our fundamental law; and

Whereas the operations of the Government, including the collection of its revenues, have been impaired and suspended by the exercise of jurisdiction over its agencies by the Federal courts; and

Whereas as a result of the issuance of extraordinary writs by Federal courts and of judgments rendered in such courts, such writs and judgments in all amounting to several thousands within the past 3 years, acts of Congress have been set aside or nullified or made inoperative: Therefore be it

Resolved, That for the aid and information of the Congress in the consideration of such conditions with a view to the correction of such abuses as may exist, the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the National Mediation Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Veterans' Administration, the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, the Social Security Board, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Railroad Retirement Board, the National Labor

Relations Board, the Works Progress Administration, the Securities Exchange Commission, and the National Bituminous Coal Commission are each requested to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the following information:

(1) A statement of all cases in which injunctions, restraining orders, or other judgments have been issued, rendered, or denied by the Supreme Court or inferior Federal courts since March 4, 1933, enjoining, suspending, or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any act of Congress, or any provision thereof, administered by such department or agency, or by any other agency the functions of which have heretofore been transferred to such department or agency.

(2) A brief statement concerning each of such cases, showing the extent to which, and the manner in which, the operations of the Government have been affected.

(3) A statement showing the instances in which there has been a conflict among the inferior Federal courts with regard to such cases.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, with reference to the resolution I may say that it merely calls for information which will be of value for the assistance of Congress and for the assistance of the Committee on the Judiciary. I respectfully ask for immediate consideration of the resolution in order that the information sought from the respective departments may be available.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I shall object if its consideration leads to any debate.

Mr. McCARRAN. If there is any debate, I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to object. I do not wish to make any suggestion that may take any time. However, I should like to ask the Senator who offered the resolution if he will not add a clause that in addition to cases in which injunctions have been granted, the several departments shall give information in connection with cases in which injunctions have been requested and denied?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have no objection to such an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object; and if its consideration does lead to debate, I shall object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the resolution be passed over for the present.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. McCARRAN subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today I submitted a resolution and asked for its immediate consideration. At that time it was thought not best to take up the resolution. I now ask that the resolution be taken up for immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the resolution?

Mr. McCARRAN. In order that the resolution may be understood by Senators who were not here when it was originally read, I ask to have it again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution again will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the resolution has been read once. Let the Senator from Nevada state its purpose. It is very easily done.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will state that in view of the controversy which is extending over the country, and in view of the fact that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States desire to be enlightened and to have at hand authentic information with reference to the effect of extraordinary writs issued by the Federal courts bearing on legislation, I have submitted a resolution asking the several departments to report to the Senate of the United States as to the number of writs affecting their respective departments that have been issued and as to the number that have been denied. The resolution addresses itself to the departments in which the litigation has taken place at times in the past. It is for the purpose of obtaining first-hand information for the Senate of the United States, in order that we may approach the consideration of a very important subject which is now pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no objection whatsoever. On the contrary, I am very heartily in favor of the Senator's resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Nevada?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

STAR-ROUTE MAIL CONTRACTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. McCARRAN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 740) to provide for the issuance of renewable 4-year-term contracts to qualified star-route contractors and subcontractors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

TARIFFS ON AND PRODUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. OVERTON (for himself and Mr. PEPPER, Mr. ANDREWS, and Mr. ELLENDER) submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by them to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. TYDINGS, the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1096) to amend section 863, title 48, of the Code of Laws of the United States of America relating to the District Court of the United States for Puerto Rico, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am about to make a request and should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The Senator from Massachusetts has introduced a bill, being Senate bill 28, to provide for taking a national unemployment census. The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and, if there be no objection, I ask that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the change of reference will be made.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on Monday last I introduced the bill (S. 1516) to authorize certain payments to the American War Mothers, Inc., the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Inc., and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Inc., which by mistake was referred to the Committee on Claims. Two similar bills involving the same subject passed the Senate during the last session. They were both considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

QUALIFICATIONS OF PRACTITIONERS OF LAW IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 204, relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed on Monday last. I also ask that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion will be entered, and the House of Representatives will be requested to return the bill.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

On motion by Mr. McNARY, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the Senator from Oregon (Mr. McNARY) be excused from further service on the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. LODGE) be appointed to membership on that committee; also that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. LODGE) be excused from further service on the Committee on Printing.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4064, the independent offices appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the able Senator from Virginia if he will state the purport of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that the purport of the bill is to make appropriations for the independent offices in Washington; and as the bill is read for action on the amendments it will appear exactly what definite appropriations are made for the respective offices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 10, to strike out:

CENTRAL STATISTICAL BOARD

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the work of the Central Statistical Board as authorized by law, including traveling expenses; materials; supplies; office equipment; services; newspapers; periodicals and press clippings; repairs and alterations; contract stenographic reporting services and not to exceed $400 for expenses of attendance at meetings which in the discretion of the chairman are necessary for the efficient discharge of the responsibilities of the Board, $173,000, of which amount not to exceed $163,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

For all printing and binding for the Central Statistical Board, $1,000.

Total, Central Statistical Board, $174,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "National Archives", on page 25, line 18, after the words "first aid" and the comma, to strike out "protective, and other apparatus and materials for the arrangement, titling, scoring, repair, processing, editing, duplication, reproduction, and authentication of photographic records (including motion-picture films) and sound recordings in the custody of the Archivist" and insert "and protective apparatus, and materials for the arrangement, repair, reproduction, and authentication of documentary, photographic, or other archives or records", and on page 26, line 13, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$735,000" and insert "$615,000", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For the Archivist and for all other authorized expenditures of the National Archives in carrying out the provisions of the act of June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1122–1124; U. S. C., title 40, ch. 2A); the act of July 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 500–503; U. S. C., Supp. 1, title 44, ch. 8A); and the act of June 22, 1936 (Public, No. 756, 74th Cong.), including personal services in the District of Columbia; supplies and equipment, including scientific, technical, first-aid and protective apparatus, and materials for the arrangement, repair, reproduction, and authentication of documentary, photographic, or other archives or records; purchase and exchange of books, including law books, books of reference, maps, and charts; contract stenographic reporting services; purchase of newspapers, periodicals, and press clippings; not to exceed $100 for payment in advance when authorized by the Archivist for library membership in societies whose publications are available to members only or to members at a price lower than to the general public; travel expenses, including not to exceed $1,000 for the expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the National Archives; repairs to equipment; maintenance and operation of motor vehicles, including the purchase and exchange of one passenger-carrying automobile for official use; and all other necessary expenses, $615,000:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 21, to reduce the total appropriation for the National Archives from $752,000 to $632,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Social Security Board", on page 37, line 4, after the words "salary of", to strike out "$9,500" and insert "$9,000"; and on page 38, line 6, after the word "Board" and the comma, to strike out "$10,000,000" and insert "$9,000,000", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For all authorized and necessary administrative expenses of the Social Security Board in performing the duties imposed upon it in titles I, II, III, IV, VII, IX, and X of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, including three Board members, an executive director at a salary of $9,000 a year, a director of the old-age benefits division at a salary of $9,000 a year, and other personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, including not to exceed $10,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the Board when specifically authorized by the chairman; not to exceed $10,000 for payment of actual transportation expenses, and not to exceed $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses of persons serving while away from their home, without other compensation, in an advisory capacity to the Social Security Board; supplies; reproducing, photographing, and all other equipment, office appliances, and labor-saving devices; services; advertising, postage, telephone, telegraph, and not to exceed $900 for teletype news services and tolls; newspapers and press clippings (not to exceed $1,500), periodicals, manuscripts, and special reports, purchase and exchange of law books and other books of reference; library membership fees or dues in organizations which issue publications to members only or to members at a lower price than to others, payment for which may be made in advance; alterations and repairs; rentals, including garages, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere; purchase and exchange, not to exceed $35,000, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes in the District of Columbia and in the field; and miscellaneous items, including those for public instruction and information deemed necessary by the Board, $9,000,000, together with any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose contained in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 21, after the name "United States", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no salary shall be paid for personal services from the money herein appropriated under the heading "Social Security Board" in excess of the rates allowed by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, for similar services: Provided further, That this proviso shall not apply to the salaries of the Board members: Provided further, That none of the funds herein appropriated under the heading "Social Security Board" shall be used to pay the salary of any expert or attorney receiving compensation of $5,000 or more per annum unless and until such expert or attorney shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 2, after the figures "1935", to strike out "$29,000,000" and insert "$15,000,000", so as to read:

Grants to States for unemployment compensation administration: For grants to States for unemployment compensation administration, as authorized in title III of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, $15,000,000, together with any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose contained in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936, on which sum such amount as may be necessary shall be available for grants under such title III for any period in the fiscal year 1937 from and after January 1, 1937.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 21, to reduce the total appropriation for the Social Security Board from $254,600,000 to $239,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Emergency agencies", on page 47, after line 14, to insert:

COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Not to exceed $525,000 of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation, established as an agency of the Government by Executive Order No. 6340, dated October 16, 1933, continued to April 1, 1937, as a governmental agency under section 7 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (Public, No. 1, 74th Cong.), and further continued to June 30, 1939, by the act of January 26, 1937 (Public, No. 2, 75th Cong.), shall be available during the fiscal year 1938 for administrative expenses of the Corporation, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, in accordance with the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and the act of June 3, 1926, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 821–833); printing and binding; law books and books of reference; not to exceed $150 for periodicals, maps, and newspapers; procurement of supplies, equipment, and services; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and all other necessary administrative expenses: Provided, That all necessary expenses (including special services performed on a contract or fee basis, but not including other personal services) in connection with the acquisition, operation, maintenance, improvement, or disposition of any real or personal property belonging to the Corporation or in which it has an interest, including expenses of collections of pledged collateral, shall be considered as nonadministrative expenses for the purposes hereof.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the able Senator from Virginia. In the consideration of the item under the head of "Commodity Credit Corporation", was any consideration given to the abolishment of this agency? I do not know that the question properly arises at this time, but I was wondering if the facts which were adduced would warrant a continuation of the organization beyond the present fiscal year.

Mr. GLASS. There was some desultory conversation in the committee about the desirability of abolishing the Commodity Credit Corporation, but it was not regarded as a wise thing to do at this time. We simply adopted the recommendation of the Budget Bureau as approved by the President. It came in at the eleventh hour. We cut the amount from $590,000.

Mr. KING. That probably commits us, then, to the continuation of the organization for the next fiscal year, unless in the meantime there should be legislation.

Mr. GLASS. Should the House concur in the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 48, after line 17, to insert:

ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

Not to exceed $300,000 of the funds of the Electric Home and Farm Authority, established as an agency of the Government by Executive Order No. 7139, of August 12, 1935, continued to February 1, 1937, by the act of March 31, 1936 (Public, No. 484, 74th Cong.), and continued further until June 30, 1939, by the act of January 26, 1937 (Public, No. 2, 75th Cong.), shall be available during the fiscal year 1938 for administrative expenses of the Authority, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, in accordance with the standardized Government travel regulations and the act of June 3, 1926, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 821–833); printing and binding; law books and books of reference; not to exceed $200 for periodicals, newspapers, and maps; procurement of supplies, equipment, and services; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and all other administrative expenses: Provided, That all necessary expenses (including special services performed on a contract or fee basis, but not including other personal services) in connection with the acquisition, care, repair, and disposition of any security or collateral now or hereafter held or acquired by the Authority, shall be considered as nonadministrative expenses for the purposes hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 18, to insert:

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON

Not to exceed $50,000 of the funds of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, established as an agency of the Government by Executive Order No. 6581, of February 2, 1934, continued until June 16, 1937, by the act approved January 31, 1935 (Public, No. 1, 74th Cong.), and further continued until June 30, 1939, under the act approved January 26, 1937 (Public, No. 2, Seventy-fifth Cong.), shall be available during the fiscal year 1938 for administrative expenses of the bank, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, in accordance with the standardized Government travel regulations and the act of June 3, 1926, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 821–833); printing and binding; law books and books of reference; not to exceed $250 for periodicals, newspapers, and maps; procurement of supplies, equipment, and services; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and all other necessary administrative expenses: Provided, That all necessary expenses (including special services performed on a contract or fee basis, but not including other personal services) in connection with the acquisition, operation, maintenance, improvement, or disposition of any real or personal property belonging to the bank or in which it has an interest, including expenses of collections of pledged collateral, shall be considered as nonadministrative expenses for the purposes hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Federal Housing Administration", on page 53, line 19, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$9,500,000" and insert "$10,000,000", so as to read:

Not to exceed $10,000,000 of the funds advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Federal Housing Administration, created under authority of the National Housing Act of June 27, 1934 (48 Stat., p. 1246), shall be available during the fiscal year 1938 for administrative expenses of the Administration, including: Personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, in accordance with the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and the act of June 3, 1926, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 821–833), except employees engaged in the inspection of property may be paid an allowance not to exceed 4 cents per mile for all travel performed by motor vehicle in connection with such inspection; printing and binding; law books, books of reference, and not to exceed $1,500 for periodicals and newspapers; not to exceed $1,500 for contract actuarial services; procurement of supplies, equipment, and services; maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; payment, when specifically authorized by the Administrator, of actual transportation expenses and not to exceed $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses to persons serving, while away from their homes, without other compensation from the United States, in an advisory capacity to the Administration; not to exceed $2,000 for expenses of attendance, when specifically authorized by the Administrator, at meetings concerned with the work of the Administration; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and all other necessary administrative expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 12, after "secs. 1701–1723)", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That not exceeding $300,000 of the sum herein authorized to be advanced from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be expended in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1938 for purposes of the Public Relations and Education Division.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 15, to strike out:

SEC. 4. None of the funds herein appropriated for any executive department or other executive agency shall be available to pay any compensation or other expense in connection with any investigation or inquiry under a resolution of either House of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 21, to change the section number from 5 to 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

TEACHING COMMUNISM IN THE DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso appearing in the fourteenth paragraph under the subheading "Miscellaneous", under the heading "Public Schools", in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, approved June 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 356), and reading as follows: "Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person teaching or advocating communism" is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person advocating communism or treating any such doctrine with favor or support; but no official or teacher shall be required to make any special declaration of nonviolation thereof as a condition for payment of salary."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate strike out, commencing with the word "hereby" in line 2, page 2, down to and including the word "salary" in line 8, and that the word "repeal" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the bill. There should be an explanation of it.

Mr. BLACK. I expect to make a statement about it.

Mr. McNARY. Let the statement be made, and then I shall decide whether I desire to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 148.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I understood this to be a privileged matter. The Senate passed a bill repealing the so-called "red rider." The House declined to agree to that bill as it was passed by the Senate. They passed a bill providing for a partial repeal, and the House bill has now come to the Senate for action.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask whether the House has passed upon the Senate bill, or did it pass a separate bill?

Mr. WHEELER. It passed a separate bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I was mistaken in my statement a few minutes ago. I did not know the House had passed a separate bill. The House did not pass upon the bill which was passed by the Senate; so it is necessary to have unanimous consent for consideration of the bill.

The Senate passed a bill which went to the House. The bill of the Senate constituted a repeal of the so-called "red rider" clause with reference to the District of Columbia schools. The House did not act upon the Senate bill. The House acted upon a bill pending in that body.

The difference between the bill of the House and the bill of the Senate is that the Senate bill provides an outright repeal of the original law which was a rider upon an appropriation act. The House did not repeal that rider in toto. Instead, it has provided that the law shall read as follows:

> That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person advocating communism or treating any such doctrine with favor or support; but no official or teacher shall be required to make any special declaration of nonviolation thereof as a condition for payment of salary.

The request I make is that the bill may be taken up for consideration, based upon the facts which I shall state.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator asking for immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. That is the request I am making.

Mr. BORAH. I believe I have no objection to immediate consideration, but I think the amendment is on the desks of Senators. I have not been able to obtain a copy of it. I am very much in favor of direct repeal, and I should like to have an oportunity to show, if I can—and I think I can—that the substitute for the direct-repeal proposal does not accomplish anything.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may state to the Senator that I agree with his views. The entire membership of the Committee on Education and Labor, to which the measure was referred, agreed with his views. We unanimously reported the provision for repeal. It passed the Senate without any objection when it was brought up. For this reason I do not see the necessity of sending the bill back to the committee. The motion I will make, if the measure shall come up for consideration, will be to strike out the words which I have just read and to substitute the word "repeal", which would put into the law the word which has already been adopted in the bill passed by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why does not the Senator propose to strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill which passed the House, and insert the Senate bill?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be very glad to do that when the bill is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. That, it seems to me, will assure consideration of the Senate proposal by the other body. What happened in this case is just what frequently transpires; the Senate passes a bill relating to a definite subject matter, it goes to the body at the other end of the Capitol, that body takes no notice, apparently, of the action taken by the Senate, but proceeds to pass upon a separate House measure.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, is the Senator quite certain that he is accurate in his statement as to the proceedings?

Mr. WHEELER. The information I have received is to that effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am certain, because the Senate bill was first passed—I do not remember the date——

Mr. BLACK. It was passed on February the 3d.

Mr. ROBINSON. The House bill passed the House on February 8, which clearly shows that after the House had jurisdiction of the Senate bill, this body having passed the Senate bill, the House ignored the action of the Senate and proceeded, as has frequently occurred, to act upon a House measure dealing with the same subject matter. So I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that there can be no objection to the proposal to proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been laid before the Senate, with a view to striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the language of the Senate bill. I shall object to the consideration of the bill which has passed the House in any other form.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have been requested by a number of citizens of the District of Columbia to ask, when this measure shall come before the Senate, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, so that opportunity may be afforded citizens to appear and voice their views. They proceeded upon the theory that probably the bill which had passed the House would be taken up for consideration. Pursuant to the request made to me, I suggest that the bill go to the committee, and that opportunity be given to those who desire to be heard pro and con to appear, and that then such action be taken by the committee as to them seems proper.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may state that this bill was introduced originally on January 6th.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. A bill identical with the one to which the Senator is referring was introduced at the last session of the Congress; hearings were held before the Committee on Education and Labor at the last session; the bill was reported out of the committee unanimously at the last session of the Congress; an identical bill went to the committee this year; it was again reported, as I understand, unanimously and passed the Senate unanimously, and then was sent to the House.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to supplement the Senator's statement. No request was made for a hearing of any kind or type during the time the bill was pending before the Committee on Education and Labor. I am of the opinion that if a request had been made the committee might have taken the position that the previous hearings—somewhat heated hearings, as I understand—before the House committee, perhaps brought out all the different philosophies which it would have been possible to voice. Personally, I should like to see the bill taken up and acted upon, not only because I favor the passage of the measure, but since the House has seen fit to pass its bill after we had sent a bill to the House, I think it is proper on our part to substitute our measure for the bill which passed the House.

Mr. WHEELER. When that is done it will go to conference, I understand.

Mr. BLACK. I assume so.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I shall not object to unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, nor under the circumstances shall I object to the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill, being assured that it is desirable that the matter should go to conference and be adjusted there.

However, I desire to make a further observation. I could not exactly hear what the chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia said about it, but it has seemed to me that a proper reference of this bill in the first place would have been to the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, just as it was referred to the House Committee on the District of Columbia when the House had the problem before it. The matter relates exclusively to the District of Columbia and, in my judgment, the bill should have been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Then I desire for my own satisfaction to make the statement that I think no problem that has ever been considered by either branch of Congress has had expended on it more arrant nonsense than this so-called "red rider." What is the "red rider"? It is simply a prohibition against the teaching and advocacy in the public schools of the miserable doctrine of communism, thereby poisoning the minds of immature children about a problem concerning which very few grown-up persons know anything. The trouble about the whole matter has been the most astonishing maladministration of a very simple statute of which I have ever had any knowledge, and for one time in 15 years of service the Comptroller General gave the most incredible opinion that any public officer ever gave, which was that every school teacher should each month take an oath that he or she had not taught or advocated communism in the public schools.

There is not a word or sentence in the statute that requires such action or by implication would seem to require it. The supposition of Congress at the time the bill was under consideration—certainly of the Committee on Appropriations considering the deficiency bill—was that the public-school authority, the superintendent of public instruction, who should be intimately acquainted with everything that goes on in the schoolrooms, would simply notify the school teachers that they were not to be permitted to teach or advocate communism, and that was all there was to it. The whole subject has been brought into disrepute by the extraordinary maladministration of a simple statute.

If the Senate now wishes to make an unconditional repeal, that, in my judgment, simply means authorization to school teachers, one and all of them, to teach and preach and advocate communism in the schools, and I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am forced to disagree with the Senator from Virginia. I originally introduced the bill to repeal the "red rider", and asked that it go to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I submit that that is the proper committee to which it should have gone, because the subject deals with education and applies to the teachers of the country. It was a matter of substantive law which, at any rate, had no business being attached to an appropriation bill.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the Senator knows that it does not apply to the teachers of the country; it applies to the teachers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree that it applies to the teachers of the District of Columbia, but it had no business on an appropriation bill in the first instance. Secondly, while the bill specifically applies to the District of Columbia its passage may set a precedent which may be used in other places, and may affect all the teachers of the United States. That, however, is a mere matter of detail.

Mr. GLASS. I agree with the Senator from Montana that the provision ought not to have been on the appropriation bill. I am always opposed to legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to misinterpret the last statement of the Senator from Montana, but if he intended to convey the idea that we had the right by Federal statute to indicate what could be taught in the schools of the States, I disagree with him.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not intend to have my statement apply to that at all. I did say that hysteria is sweeping the country with reference to the teachers of the District of Columbia. A school teacher, as I understand, is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, just the same as is a Senator. However, the proposed legislation went further. It not only provided that the teachers should not teach communism, but it likewise said that they should not teach un-American doctrines.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to refer to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking about the statute.

Mr. GLASS. While the Senator is examining the statute I should like to have him point out any word or sentence in it which authorizes any such thing as requiring a teacher to take an oath.

Mr. WHEELER. It is in the original act.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator again yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The original act contained no such provision as stated by the Senator. It merely provided that teachers should not teach or advocate communism in the schools in the District of Columbia. It did not contain the further provision stated by the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If I recollect, Mr. President, the difficulty arose from the interpretation placed by the fiscal officer of the District upon the enactment of the Congress, and that the fiscal officer requires each month, before the pay check is given, that an assertion, and, perhaps, even an oath, must be taken that there has been no action on the part of the teacher to advocate or teach communism. I think that is where the difficulty arose.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator from Virginia that the Comptroller had no right to act as he did, and was wrong in putting the interpretation he did upon the provision. However, he not only applied it to the school teachers but he applied it to the janitors and to the clerks and to everybody else. I have a letter from Dr. Ballou with reference to this particular amendment, in which he says:

> This morning I read with interest the amendment attached to the bill originally prepared to provide for the outright repeal of the so-called "red rider", which I understand to be as follows—

Then he quotes the language, which contains the words—

> Or other un-American doctrine.

That is where I got the wrong impression.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; he mentioned that, but the statute does not.

Mr. WHEELER. I find upon examination that the statute does not mention it. Dr. Ballou continues:

> You are undoubtedly aware of the fact that the Comptroller General now requires every officer, teacher, clerk, and custodian in the public schools to make a declaration that he has not taught or advocated communism within the meaning of the existing law as a condition of his receiving his salary. The officers and teachers make such declarations at the end of each month, and the clerks and the custodians make such declarations twice each month, preceding their pay day on the 15th of the month and the final day of the month.

Mr. GLASS. Does the writer say that he thinks there was any warrant in the statute for any such proceeding?

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. GLASS. It is an utterly absurd proceeding.

Mr. WHEELER. Unfortunately, we now have that situation. There is only one way to correct it, and that is to repeal the measure.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, there was a way to correct it. Had the superintendent of public instruction, the man in charge, done his duty, he would have notified the school teachers not to teach or advocate communism, and that would have ended it. However, he did not do that.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia that the burden rested on the superintendent of public instruction to tell the teachers anything of the kind. It only involved the superintendent of public instruction in a controversy in which he should not have been involved. I think the Comptroller was wrong.

I continue reading from Dr. Ballou's letter:

> The above amendment specifically provides that "no official or teacher" shall hereafter be required to make such a declaration. If this bill as it finally passed the House of Representatives yesterday becomes a law, the officers and teachers would no longer be required to make declarations as a basis of receiving their pay.
> However, no mention is made of the 100 clerks who make such declarations twice a month, and about 725 custodians who make corresponding declarations twice each month. Was it the intention of the House of Representatives that the Comptroller General would continue to require clerks and custodians to make declarations as heretofore? If this was not the intention of the House, then the language in the bill as it passed the House ought, it seems to me, to be so modified as to make that fact clear.
> Since it seems apparent that this language represents an oversight, I respectfully suggest that if the conferees of the House and Senate desire to agree upon this amendment as it passed the House, the amendment be modified by including the following language as a substitute—

And so forth.

Mr. President, with reference to the original proposal to the effect that teachers of the District of Columbia should not teach communism, as I understand—and if I am wrong about it I hope someone will correct me—those teachers take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. I have six children, all of whom have gone or are going to the public schools in the District of Columbia. They have gone through the primary grades, and some have gone clear through the high schools. I submit that every Senator upon the floor of this body and every Member of the House of Representatives who has had children in the public schools of the District of Columbia will say that the teachers in the District of Columbia are of at least as high a grade as can be found anywhere in the United States. I think it is an insult to the intelligence and to the decency of the teachers of the District of Columbia to say to them, "You must take an oath that you will not teach communism", or even to provide in an act of Congress that "You must not teach communism", thereby intimating that we do not have faith or confidence in them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. We do not put such provisions in other appropriation bills. We do not say that no part of the funds appropriated to pay the salaries of Congressmen or Senators shall be available to those who advocate communism. We do not make that applicable to executive officers of the Government. Why apply it to a single class of employees in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator; if we are going to apply it to teachers, let it apply also to others.

Mr. ROBINSON. The use of the language is an implication that the teachers of the District of Columbia are advocating communism.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the testimony before the committee was that some of them were.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator with reference to that suggestion that that is the very trouble with this provision. As I have said, I have had six children going to the public schools here. I know something about the minds of children. I know that my children have come home at times and reported to me that a teacher told them so and so and, on checking it up, I found that the child completely misunderstood what the teacher said. There are many people in the United States today who are denouncing the President of the United States because of his advocacy of a proposal to put six additional judges upon the Supreme Court, and suggesting that that is communism. What is communism?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement is also made that in some instances salaries appropriated for executive employees are actually paid to sympathizers with communism.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly, and to communists.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is in answer to what was said by the Senator from Virginia. But I renew the point that it is a very feeble effort to incorporate such a provision in a bill relating to a few teachers in the District of Columbia and not to seek to extend the legislation to the very important spheres of administration and legislation itself.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Virginia says that the testimony before the committee was to the effect that some of the school teachers taught communism. If a Senator on this floor will stand up and tell me what is communism, I should like to have him do it. I have not been able to find anybody who can intelligently define the term and tell me what communism is. It is one thing under Stalin; it is another thing under Trotzky; and is another thing under somebody else. The difficulty is that when this hysteria sweeps the country, as it does at times, people completely lose their sense of balance and come forward and say, "This man is a Communist."

I do not agree with the President of the United States with reference to putting six additional judges upon the Supreme Court, but I want to have the school teachers accorded the right to agree with him and discuss the question if they want to without being charged with being Communists. I do not want a school teacher, because he says that he thinks the Constitution ought to be changed, to be charged with communism and discharged from his position. I want the teachers here to have an opportunity to have free speech as everywhere else in the United States of America.

While I am on that subject, let me say that I came into frequent contact with the question of free speech during the World War. At that time, as a matter of fact, there was more hysteria in the United States than could be found in England or France. The farther away from the war the greater the hysteria. People in my State were seeing German airplanes flying over the mountains there with a view to blowing them up, and everyone who did not join in denouncing the Germans was reported to be pro-German or something worse. Even a Senator from Minnesota whose house was painted yellow, notwithstanding the fact that we all recognized him as a great American citizen and just as loyal as anybody else, was denounced during that period of hysteria as being pro-German, as were other Senators in this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I correctly understand that the words "teaching communism" include an explanation to students of what communism is? I do not understand that any of the school teachers in the District have ever advocated communism or that the United States should adopt a communistic form of government or the communistic theory. They have, perhaps, as they ought to have done, advised their students of what communism is. I think that is the best way in the world to get rid of communism, if there is any around.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, there cannot be any question about that at all. But the trouble is that if a teacher should mention the term "communism" some child, my child or the child of someone else, might get an entirely false impression of what that teacher was trying to tell them about communism; the child might gain the impression that the teacher was trying to teach the students communism. They come home and tell their parents, who then become hysterical and pass it on to somebody else, and somebody else passes it on to somebody else, and finally some of these so-called "crackpots" around the city of Washington, who are always trying to look after the patriotism of the people of the United States, and think that they carry all the patriotism there is in the world in their own breasts, come to Congress and ask Congress solemnly to pass a law to the effect that the teachers in the District of Columbia shall be forbidden to teach or advocate communism, notwithstanding that they have already taken an oath to uphold the Constitution of the United States of America.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator attempted to quote a few moments ago the text of the act. If he will permit me, I should like to read it.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The text is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person teaching or advocating communism.

The prohibition was against advocating as well as teaching.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me ask what does the Senator understand "teaching communism" to mean?

Mr. KING. I am not called upon to interpret the phrase.

Mr. GLASS. Let me say, if I may be permitted, that the corporation counsel, Mr. Prettyman, interpreted it to mean just exactly what it says—that the teachers should not teach communism or advocate communism.

Let me say, if I may, to the Senator from Montana, that I think we have gone far afield in discussing what was said and done during the World War. To get back to the real question, I agree that this rider should never have been put on the appropriation bill. I have invariably voted against putting legislation on appropriation bills. I was not present at the meeting when this was done, although I find my name attached to the conference report.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me at that point?

Mr. GLASS. I have not the floor, but I yield, if I may.

Mr. ROBINSON. The trouble with the suggestion the Senator is now making is that the language of the act commonly known as the "red rider" did not violate the rule forbiding the incorporation of legislation in an appropriation bill. It was a limitation.

Mr. GLASS. It was so contended that it was a limitation.

Mr. ROBINSON. And it was a limitation to the effect that hereafter no part of any appropriation shall be available, and so forth. That is not legislation within the rules of either body; that is a limitation; and, as has always been held, it is competent for the Congress to incorporate such a limitation in an appropriation bill. Frequently limitations are close akin to legislation, and undoubtedly that was the case in this instance. If, however, there is fear that the teachers in the employ of the Government of the United States will corrupt the minds of the youth whom they instruct, if there is fear that employees of the Government of the United States will pervert fundamental principles of Americanism, as we understand them, let the legislation be applicable to everyone in the employ of the United States and do not confine it to the District of Columbia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not think everybody teaches school children; I do not think United States Senators engage in the business of teaching school children.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; but United States Senators are engaged in the important work of legislating, and if any doctrine is going to be stifled by legislative process, why not do it directly? Why permit a man who is a Communist to occupy a seat in the Senate of the United States?

Mr. GLASS. We permit it because the State sends him here and we cannot help it.

Mr. ROBINSON. We permit it because it is un-American to exclude him even though he entertains some views to which we do not agree. I do not know of anybody here who favors communism, nor do I know of anybody in the other branch of Congress who favors it.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia that we cannot help it, let me add that, under the Constitution, the Senate is the sole judge of the qualifications of its Members. It can exclude a Senator for any reason it chooses.

Mr. GLASS. But it never exercises the right at times when it should.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is probably true, but the Senator's last suggestion does not support his position; it supports mine.

Mr. GLASS. My position is that we should not have enacted this legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree very heartily with that statement. Then, why not repeal it?

Mr. GLASS. My position is that there is not a sentence in the statute that justifies the narrow administration of the legislation. My only fear in the matter is——

Mr. ROBINSON rose.

Mr. GLASS. May I finish the sentence?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. My only fear in the matter is that if we make an outright repeal of the language it will mean an invitation to the teachers to teach all the communism they may want to teach.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree that the action of the Comptroller, in requiring all school employees in the District of Columbia to swear over and over and over that they were not teaching communism, was a foolish act and more than anything else than has ever occurred it impeaches the record of his administration.

But on the point of construction and enforcement I invite attention to the language in the House bill. It is a limitation on the use of the appropriation. The disbursing officer is apparently charged with the responsibility of passing judgment, in every case when he disburses salaries, on the question as to whether the receiver of the salary has advocated communism or treated any such doctrine with favor or support.

It is impossible of actual practical application unless some agency be set up with authority to pass judgment on the question whether, when a teacher tells a pupil what communism is, he is treating it with favor or support, as was implied in the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. It makes it impossible of practical application without recognizing in some authority the power to determine whether an employee of the school has conformed with the statute. Preliminary to the payment it is necessary to decide that the limitation has been conformed to, otherwise the limitation would be wholly ineffective.

Let me say further, by courtesy of the Senator from Montana who now has the floor, that my suggestion was that the Senate bill providing for unqualified repeal be substituted for the text of the House bill in order that the whole matter might be considered by the conferees. I did not advocate the reference of the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia for the reason that the subject has been under discussion in Washington in the press and in some of the committees almost continuously since the passage of what we know as the "red rider." There is no new information that could be produced concerning it. It is not a question that calls for prolonged study by a committee. It is doubtful whether any further reference to a committee would do anything more than intensify the controversy and give volume to something which, as said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], is of a nature that ought never to have arisen. My thought is that is the best way to dispose of the matter. At the same time, if the Senate desires to prolong the controversy, the best way I know to do it is to send the bill to another committee and let the same persons who have been heard heretofore again express their opinions on the subject.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. I hope the Senator from Arkansas does not understand that I want the bill sent to another committee, particularly a committee of which I am a member. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Having been a school teacher until 2 years ago, I am more than usually interested in this subject. The story of the repeal is already known, except perhaps for a little information which might be given as to the procedure in the House. An outright repeal bill was brought forward by the chairman of the House District Committee, and to that was added an amendment striking out reference to "teaching" communism, leaving it relating only to "advocating" communism, in a way making each person who voted against the amendment feel that by that very vote he was approving the advocating of communism, which, of course, was not necessarily true.

I do not favor communism, I do not favor immorality; but I do not believe we can legislate either morality or patriotism into anybody. I think we must leave this matter to the school boards and superintendents; in other words, to those who hire the school teachers.

We would not think of passing a bill prohibiting teachers from teaching crime, because we take it for granted that superintendents and school boards will not hire teachers who would teach crime or immorality. This presumption is so strong that to pass such a measure would, by implication, be almost tantamount to making the charge that teachers in general have been teaching crime. The same thing is true as applied to the teaching of communism.

There is a strong presumption that no teacher in the United States will teach or advocate communism; and for us to repeal this rider, which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] admits should never have been passed, and which is so offensive to the teaching profession, will in no way imply that we thereby favor the teaching or advocating of communism, but will rather state to the Nation that we take it for granted that no teacher under the Stars and Stripes will be so disloyal as to advocate a political doctrine so diametrically opposed to our form of government as is communism.

The Senator from Virginia suggested that the provision deals with such a small sector of the United States that it should not be given such wide consideration, but the question has now become a national question with the educators of the United States. It is an indication of what the National Congress feels should be done throughout the United States, because this small sector of the country is the part for which we legislate. Therefore it is a question of national consequence.

I feel deeply about the matter. I feel that this provision should be repealed. I believe that the history of the teachers of the past has not been such as to warrant our feeling that they have been disloyal. The first time I ever heard of the Battles of Concord and Lexington was when I heard it from a teacher. The first time I ever heard of the midnight ride of Paul Revere I heard it at the feet of a teacher. I learned all the glowing stories of American history in the classroom. As new immigrants came from other countries to America and settled, they could not speak English, but their children went to school and at the feet of their teachers learned patriotism, and thus have the foreign-born become Americanized. I believe we can trust the teaching of patriotism to the educators of America. I, therefore, favor the repeal of this offensive "red rider."

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I do not desire to prolong the debate, but I do wish to impress the thought upon the Senate that I am in thorough accord with what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said when he suggested that we ought to substitute the Senate bill for the House language and it ought to go to conference and there be threshed out.

I am sure no one in the Senate believes in the advocacy of communism. When I vote for some labor bill some people in the United States think I am a Communist, and when I turn around and vote with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on some other bill——

Mr. GLASS. Then the Senator is right! [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Then others think I am wrong again. I do not know whether I am a conservative or a radical. The Senator from Virginia thinks I am right when I vote with him, and somebody else thinks I am wrong when I vote with him.

The difficulty with the whole subject is that the term "communism" has so many meanings, just as the terms "socialism" and other "isms" have so many different meanings that it is exceedingly difficult for anyone to correctly define just what they do mean. Let some teacher advocate this or that idea and some of the young minds in their classes will go home and say to their fathers or mothers, "My teacher talked about this and that", and the parents in many cases immediately say the teacher is a Communist and ought to be thrown out of the school.

I am in hearty accord with what the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] has said. I do not believe there has ever been in the United States a more patriotic group than our school teachers. I do not believe there is a more patriotic group of citizens anywhere in the United States than the school teachers of the District of Columbia. I think this provision of law ought to be repealed. I think it never should have been inserted in the law in the first place, and, having been put in the law, I now believe we ought to repeal it and get it off the statute books. I think it reflects not upon the school teachers but upon the Congress of the United States to keep it there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 148, to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BLACK. I move, as an amendment, that all after the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out and that the language of Senate bill 530 be substituted therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of the text of the House bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the proviso appearing in the fourteenth paragraph under the subheading "Miscellaneous" under the heading "Public schools" in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, approved June 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 356), and reading as follows: "Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person teaching or advocating communism", is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

LEGAL WORK FOR RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the Attorney General of the United States in reply to a letter from me, in which I requested the Attorney General to furnish me with a list of the attorneys who are doing legal work in the various States in connection with the Resettlement Administration, and a statement of the amount of money turned over by the Resettlement Administration to the Department of Justice for the purpose of hiring attorneys.

To my amazement, I find that for the fiscal year 1937 the sum of $500,000 was turned over by the Resettlement Administration to the Department of Justice for the purpose of hiring lawyers in the various States throughout the Union, and that this was in addition to the appropriation to the Department of Justice itself. I find that in my State about eight or nine lawyers were employed to do such legal work.

My own feeling about the matter is that instead of hiring a dozen different lawyers in the various States, the work should be done by the United States district attorney for each district and each State, and that the district attorneys should be furnished with the number of assistants they need, if they require additional assistants. The idea of setting up in each State a dozen different legal departments seems to me to be ridiculous, and it adds greatly to the expense of the legal department of the Government. I think it is wrong in principle, and it ought to be stopped.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from Montana will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1937.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of February 4, 1937, there is enclosed herewith a list of attorneys who are doing legal work in various States in connection with the Resettlement Administration.

For the fiscal year 1937 the Resettlement Administration transferred to this Department through the Bureau of the Budget the sum of $500,000 to cover salaries of attorneys, advertising costs, stenographic services, fees of commissioners, expert witnesses, etc.

I trust this is the information you are seeking.

With kind regards, sincerely yours,

HOMER S. CUMMINGS,
Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, LANDS DIVISION,
February 8, 1937.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, apropos of the statement just made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I will state that a day or two ago I submitted a resolution asking for a thorough investigation of the activities and expenditures of the Resettlement Administration. When I was in my home State recently I made some investigations of the matter, as I have done in other States; and I now make the charge that the expenditures of that organization have been extravagant and in many instances wasteful.

I shall not ask that action be taken at present upon the resolution which I have submitted for the reason that I have had a conference with officials in the Agriculture Department who now are taking over the activities of the Resettlement Administration, and I have assurances that an investigation will be made, and it is hoped that some economies will be introduced into the Resettlement Administration. Unless within a reasonable time we receive a report to the effect that that has been done, I shall ask for the investigation which my resolution seeks.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in that connection, if the Senator will indulge me, I am advised that the Secretary of Agriculture, who recently acquired jurisdiction of the Resettlement Administration, is making a very thorough study of the matter, recognizing that part of the work which has been done has been experimental and that there is opportunity and need for improvement. I think the Senator has wisely deferred urging action upon his resolution.

Mr. WHEELER. There is a United States district attorney in each district in the United States. In my State the district attorney is paid, I think, about $5,000 a year. There are special attorneys who are receiving $5,500 a year to do this other kind of work in two or three different places, and others who are receiving three or four thousand dollars a year. All that work ought to be done by the district attorney in the particular district, and, if necessary, he should have additional assistants under his department; but a lawyer should not be paid three or four or five thousand dollars a year for part-time work, or for a third of his time, or for a fourth of his time, when we have district attorneys who are supposed to devote practically all their time to their official duties.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator, from my own knowledge, so far as my State is concerned, that no lawyer has been paid by the Department of Justice for part-time duty for doing work for the Resettlement Administration. I happen to know one lawyer who has been employed outside of the district attorney's office, I understand, but who devotes his whole time to his official duties, dividing his time between the work of the Resettlement Administration, the work of the Forestry Service in acquiring titles to new forests which have been opened up, and various other governmental activities. It is entirely true that he is outside of the district attorney's office, but it is not by any means true that he is on part-time employment.

I do not believe any money has been wasted by the Department of Justice in its employment of lawyers for the various extraordinary activities which have been going on for the past 2 or 3 years.

Mr. WHEELER. I happen to know that some of the lawyers who are employed in the way I have stated carry on a very extensive and very fine practice, and at the same time draw very good salaries from the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is my impression that the Department of Justice is one of the most carefully and economically administered branches of the Government. Its comparatively small appropriations indicate that fact. Of course, it is true that the Department, under recent legislation, and I think in response to public demand, has undertaken much work in which formerly it did not engage. The salaries to which the Senator from Montana is referring, if I correctly understand him, are those of employees in various special agencies who are paid by the Department of Justice or through the Department of Justice. Is that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. What happens is this: We appropriate money for the Resettlement Administration. Five hundred thousand dollars of the money that is appropriated for the Resettlement Administration is turned over to the Department of Justice. With that $500,000 the Department of Justice employs lawyers all over the United States to pass upon titles; and many of the lawyers who are thus employed are not whole-time lawyers for the Government. They are lawyers who are also engaged in the general practice of the law. I happen to know that that is the case.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has made reference to attorneys employed by the Department of Justice to aid the Resettlement Administration and other agencies in connection with the purchase of land. I cannot speak for other States as to the method of employment; but in the case of the State of Alabama I can say that in quite a number of instances to my own certain, definite knowledge the Department of Justice has declined to employ lawyers upon a part-time basis. The Department was denied the privilege of employing lawyers whom it desired to employ in Alabama because they declined to give up their private practice. As a result the Department employed other lawyers, requiring that they work on a full-time basis. These lawyers did not retain their private law practice, and they were not permitted to do so if they kept the positions with the Department of Justice.

In fairness to the Department I desire to have that statement appear in the RECORD in connection with the employment of lawyers, certainly in the State of Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad to hear the Senator's statement about Alabama; but it certainly is not true as to many other States, to my own certain knowledge.

While I am on the subject I will say that my attention has also been called to a situation which I think ought to be corrected. I am reliably informed that some of the men who have been in the Department of Justice resign as assistant attorneys general, and are then appointed as special assistants to take charge of some particular case at eight or ten thousand dollars a year; and they still practice before some of the Departments here in Washington, notwithstanding the fact that they have special retainers from the Government of the United States. I think that is something that ought to be stopped.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to take a portion of the time of the Senate this afternoon in discussing the President's proposal regarding the Supreme Court.

Mr. Woodward, in his History of the United States, in discussing the Constitution, on page 234 said:

> Though the Constitution is clumsily rigid in some of its provisions, on the whole it possesses a remarkable flexibility.
> * * * It is characterized by subtle omissions or silences, which allow great latitude in the judicial interpretation of constitutional questions.

I endorse this opinion of Mr. Woodward, and take it as my text.

The flexibility of the Constitution, the omissions or silences of the Constitution which allow such great latitude in judicial interpretation, have always been, to my mind, one of the wonders of our Constitution. In my judgment, the Constitution, as it is today, affords ample power to the Congress, if properly interpreted and the bills are properly prepared, to pass all the forward-looking measures of the New Deal. We need no constitutional amendments.

It must be remembered that in 1787, when the Constitution was created, there were no steamboats or steamship lines, no railroads, no hard roads, no telegraphs or telephones, no streetcars, no gas companies, no electric lights, no electric power, no automobiles, no radios, no moving pictures, no newspapers of any great circulation, no airplanes, no public schools, as we now understand that term, exceedingly few colleges and other institutions of learning, practically very few corporations, few if any injunctions, few if any combinations of labor, few if any combinations of capital, no Federal courts at all, the State courts applying the law as State judges had received it from our British forefathers. Though all these things have come since, under our Constitution they can all be dealt with under the flexibility of that great instrument.

Our Government, under our Constitution, is a government of checks and balances. It was the purpose of the founders of that Government to establish three coordinate branches, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. While they were constituted with the largest measure of independence, the greatest care was taken to make them coordinate and cooperative. The most carefully devised checks were made on the Executive power. The same care was exercised in checking the legislative and judicial branches.

For instance, the Executive was given the right of veto, but his veto could be overruled by a two-thirds vote. He was given the power of administering the Government, but only Congress could furnish him the money with which to do it. He was given the power to raise and support armies, but money to pay and equip armies could not be given for a longer period than 2 years. No money could be drawn from the Treasury except in accordance with appropriations made by Congress.

The Executive was given the power to appoint all officers of the Government, but only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He was to be elected for only a 4-years' term. He could be impeached by the House and removed from office by the Senate. He could make treaties with foreign governments, but the Senate must confirm these treaties to make them valid. He was to be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but the Congress had the right to make rules and regulations for the land and naval forces.

In like manner, the legislative branch was hedged around with checks. It was given the power to pass laws, but the Executive could veto them. It was given the power to tax, but all taxes had to be uniform. The Congress was denied the right of suspending the writ of habeas corpus except in extreme cases. It could pass no bill of attainder or ex post facto law. It could pass no law fixing export duties. It could not interfere with the right of the people to bear arms. It could not permit a soldier in time of peace to be quartered in any home. It could make no law establishing religion, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people to assemble and ask for a redress of grievances. It could make no law to prevent the people from being secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches. It prohibited the Congress passing a law permitting men to be held for a capital or otherwise infamous crime except by an indictment by a grand jury. It prohibited Congress passing a law putting a man twice in jeopardy, or compelling a criminal to be a witness against himself, or a law depriving a citizen of his rightful liberty or property without due process of law, nor permitting private property to be taken for public use without just compensation. It provided for an impartial jury trial, both in criminal and civil cases. Incidentally, the Supreme Court has virtually abolished trial by jury.

In addition to those I have enumerated, there are many other checks to be found in the Constitution.

In like manner, the judicial branch of the Government was hedged about with checks. The members of the Supreme Court were to hold their offices during good behavior. They were subject to impeachment. They were to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The number of the members of the Supreme Court was to be fixed by the Congress. Their jurisdiction was remarkably limited. Their original jurisdiction was confined to cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State was a party. Their appellate jurisdiction was likewise limited to admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, to controversies between a State and a citizen of another State, between citizens of different States, and to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties. They had no express jurisdiction to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional or invalid. The Supreme Court was to have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and facts "with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." The Supreme Court could not fix the number of its members, but Congress had that right, and has exercised it exactly seven times.

By the Constitution, no branch of the Government was given exclusive power or supreme power or independent power. Each was made, in a very great degree, dependent upon the other. Those in control of each branch of the Government know perfectly of the limitations on that particular branch, and also know perfectly well of the limitations and powers of the other two branches.

I desire to call special attention to this statement: That supreme sovereign power was to be lodged in the Supreme Court cannot possibly be maintained by reference to the Constitution itself, by any implication of the Constitution, by any law, by history, or by precedent. With the express power that the Congress should regulate the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, both as to law and as to facts, it is unquestionably true that the Congress, and not the Supreme Court, was to be the final arbiter. Those who assert that the Supreme Court is superior to either the Congress or to the Executive under our system little understand our great Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee, for whom I have the utmost respect, what he considers the function of the judicial department, a coordinate department of our Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. To do just exactly what the Constitution provides it shall do, no more and no less; that is, have appellate jurisdiction over all acts of Congress which may be brought into dispute, and all other Federal questions, as they are commonly called. Of course the Court has an extremely limited original jurisdiction, but this is unimportant.

Mr. GEORGE. If they are to have jurisdiction over all acts of Congress and other Federal questions which may arise, what are they to do; decide the law or not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course they are required to decide the law.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator another question. What is the supreme law of our country?

Mr. McKELLAR. The supreme law of our country is what Congress and the President make it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not rest his answer on that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I rest it on the Constitution. The Constitution itself says that the acts of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no, Mr. President!

Mr. McKELLAR. I read it in that way.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no!

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have the Senator show me where the Constitution provides otherwise.

Mr. GEORGE. The Constitution expressly declares that the Constitution is the supreme law, and acts of Congress "made in pursuance thereof." I ask the Senator again: What is the function of the Supreme Court?

Mr. McKELLAR. The function of the Supreme Court is to pass upon all questions upon which the Constitution gives the Congress the right to legislate. That is its function.

Mr. GEORGE. And nothing else?

Mr. McKELLAR. And nothing else. I challenge the Senator to show me a line in the Constitution which holds that the Supreme Court has the right to declare void an act of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to argue with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just ask the Senator to show me such a provision.

Mr. GEORGE. I asked the Senator the simple question: What is the function of the judiciary under our system of government? Finally, the Senator has said that it is to construe the law. Then I asked the Senator: What is the supreme law? The Senator said it was the acts of Congress and what the President chooses to make it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The acts of Congress are the supreme law of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. The acts of Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. The acts of Congress made under the Constitution are the supreme law of the land.

Mr. GEORGE. Acts made in pursuance of the Constitution, and not contrary to it. If that statement is made, I will agree with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, Mr. President, there is no disagreement between us.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, I ask again, The function of the Court is to construe what?

Mr. McKELLAR. To construe the meanings of the acts of Congress. I have already said, as the Senator would have heard had he been listening, that early in our constitutional history our Supreme Court assumed the power to declare void and invalid acts of Congress. It did not have the specific right to do it under the Constitution. There was no provision under the Constitution which authorized the Court to do it, but the Court assumed such power. That practice has been going on for 134 years and, in my judgment, it is imbedded in our Constitution just as if we had passed an amendment to the Constitution in the ordinary way making such provision. The Congress did not initiate such an amendment to the Constitution. The Supreme Court of the United States simply amended the Constitution by judicial dictum first and then decision.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to argue the question with the Senator from Tennessee. At a later date I shall argue it not only with the Senator from Tennessee but with any other Senator on the floor. I was simply asking a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Georgia has the right to any opinion he desires about the Constitution or the laws of the United States. I assert my right to my own opinion in the same way. If the Senator would do me the courtesy to listen to what I have to say, I think he would differ with me less than he does now.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee continues with his statement, I wish to ask him a question. I was somewhat confused by the remarks which passed back and forth between the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Georgia. However, as I understood the Senator from Tennessee, his position now is that the Supreme Court does have the right to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. Only by reason of long lapse of time and usage. I think the people have accepted the Supreme Court's assumption of power. I think the Supreme Court has the power to declare acts unconstitutional and invalid by reason of this long assumption of power on the part of the Court, and not by reason of any word or sentence or provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. Regardless of how the power came about, the Senator agrees that the power now rests in the Supreme Court?

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree that it now is exercised and has been exercised for a great number of years by the Supreme Court, and that apparently the people have acquiesced in the assumption by the Court that it has that power. But I continue. Mr. President, the Supreme Court early assumed the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. The Constitution itself did not give that power to the Supreme Court specifically. In my judgment, it ought to have done so.

I am saying this for the benefit of the Senator from New Mexico. If it had done so, and had hedged the power about with proper checks and balances, it would have been far better. In my opinion, by reason of the Court's having assumed for 134 years the power to declare acts of Congress void it has that power; and that assumption of power having been acquiesced in for so long, the Court's amendment to the Constitution has been effected just as securely as if an amendment to the Constitution had been agreed to by the people in the way pointed out by the Constitution. What the Court did was to amend the Constitution by their own judicial decision. The right exercised by the Court of declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional is a judicial amendment to our Constitution. That is the best that can be said of it.

I hope I make myself clear to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. However, when the Supreme Court exercises this power it has full knowledge that the Congress and Executive have power to fix the membership of the Court, and that the Congress and the Executive a number of times have exercised that power. They first fixed the number in 1789 at six. It was reduced to five in 1801. It was increased to seven in 1807. It was increased to nine in 1837. It was increased to 10 in 1863. It was reduced to seven in 1866. It was increased to nine in 1869. The Supreme Court knows perfectly well that the Congress and the Executive have the power by law to change the number on the Supreme Bench. It is a power which the Constitution grants. It is a power that these two branches of the Government have and have frequently exercised. Therefore, an increase of the members of the Court canot be either unconstitutional or revolutionary.

In some letters I am asked not to interfere with the Constitution. This proposal to increase the number of Judges is standing by the Constitution. It is within the terms of the Constitution to increase the membership of the Court. It is not a violation of the Constitution. It is a measure strictly in accord with the Constitution.

After the Civil War, conditions between the Court and the Government were in a sense like they were at the beginning of this administration. In an editorial in the Nation of January 10, 1867, the following appears:

> All the issues of the war and of the era of reconstruction succeeding the war will be submitted to the judgment of this Court; and a strenuous effort will be made to secure from it decisions which will nullify the will of the people and vindicate the rejected policy of Mr. Johnson.

And again:

> The Supreme Court consists at present of nine Judges, five of them appointed by a Republican President and four by his Democratic predecessors. Unfortunately, it cannot be doubted that at least four of the Judges have so thoroughly made up their minds upon all the issues of reconstruction as to make argument before them a mere form. Chief Justice Chase could not be persuaded by Moses and the prophets that the present State governments in the South are legitimate, while Judges Nelson, Grier, and Clifford could not be persuaded of the contrary, even by one who should rise from the dead.

This is not the first time this question has raised its head in our country.

I again quote from the same editorial:

> The Supreme Court always prior to 1867 was wisely anxious to leave political questions to be determined by the legislature, and repeatedly declined to interfere in cases which afforded quite as much ground for interference as any which are now likely to arise. The Judges foresaw that any attempt to control such controversy by judicial decisions would only peril the existence of the Court while settling nothing for the country, and they rightly decided to avoid such uncompensated risks.

DIRECT PRECEDENT

There is a direct precedent for the President's proposal. In 1869 the Congress increased the number on the Supreme Court just before the Court held the Legal Tender Act of Congress unconstitutional and void by a closely divided court. At that time there was no gold nor silver in the country to be coined, and the Constitution only gave to Congress power to coin money. The issuance of paper was not coining money, of course. Paper money was an absolute necessity at the time. The Congress in 1862 had established paper money as currency and made it receivable for all debts, public and private, except two. The Supreme Court held the act unconstitutional. The decision of the Supreme Court was rendered on the 7th day of February 1870, and on the same morning President Grant sent in the nominations of two additional members of the Court, Justices Strong and Bradley. He was charged with packing the Court. Those two members became violent partisans of upholding the legal-tender clause, as it was called at that time. President Grant was charged with packing the Court, just as President Roosevelt is now being charged with the same design.

The reorganized Court with Justices Strong and Bradley on it, reversed the former judgment of the Court, and held the act constitutional on the ground that it was an emergency act. The country acquiesced in it and has acquiesced in it ever since. We still issue paper money, good for all debts, public and private. I doubt that there is an informed judge, a lawyer, or citizen who does not believe that what the Congress and President and Court then did was for the best interest of this Republic. It has never been undone, and never will be. It is quite true that the President was charged with packing the Supreme Court, but the effect at that time was salutary.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator will recall that at about that same period the Congress of the United States, finding the Supreme Court at that time composed of 10 members, the largest it has ever been and that was under Lincoln—after Lincoln's death, in order to prevent Andrew Johnson from having an appointment on the Court, which was ageing very rapidly, changed the law, reducing the Court to 7, so that Johnson could not have an appointee on the Court. Then, just as soon as Grant came in, they changed it back to nine, so that Grant could have an appointment on the Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is absolutely correct; and I digress here long enough to point out, as I intend to show later on in my address, the remarkable situation that there have been only four Presidents who have never made an appointment to the Supreme Court. One of them was William Henry Harrison, who lived for a little more than 30 days or about 30 days after he was inaugurated; he did not appoint a Supreme Court judge. The second one was Zachary Taylor, who lived 1 year and 4 months after his inauguration, and did not have an appointment to the Supreme Court. The third was Andrew Johnson, who, by the law that has just been mentioned by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], was deprived of the opportunity of appointing any judge on that Court. And the fourth is Franklin Roosevelt. The Presidents who have made no appointments to the Supreme Court are Harrison, Taylor, Johnson, and Franklin Roosevelt! And then talk about Roosevelt's attempting to pack the Supreme Court! Up to this date it has been quite securely packed against him!

Mr. President, I proceed with the discussion.

COURTS

Now, as to the main question. Mr. President, I believe in courts. I am a strong believer in courts. I believe in the Federal courts. I believe in the honesty and sincerity and uprightness and ability of its judges. I think in the main they have done their duty as they see it. On the other hand, I do not believe they are infallible. I think our Supreme Court—perhaps the greatest court in all the world, and I cheerfully concede it and am proud of it—has made a number of mistakes. Chief Justice Marshall is generally accredited with having issued the first dictum holding an act of Congress invalid. This dictum appears in the case of Marbury against Madison, decided in 1803. However, there was an earlier informal opinion by Chief Justice Jay. February 3, 1791, the Congress had passed a law directing the President to examine and report upon and the Treasurer to pay the claims of invalid pensioners of the Revolution. President Washington asked the Supreme Court, it having nothing to do in the early days, to pass upon these claims and make a report to him but the Court refused to do this work. Mr. William E. Curtis, in the Chautauqua of July 1897, says:

> This action of Congress undoubtedly arose from the knowledge that the Court had existed for a year without any business to transact, and the popular opinion that the Justices ought to do something to earn their salaries rather than any intention of subverting their power and authority or infringing upon their constitutional prerogatives. But the Court refused to comply with this law on the ground, first that Congress could not assign it duties not defined in the Constitution, second that the Constitution did not authorize the national legislature to sit as a court of errors, and third that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was final. This was the official reply, but in a private communication the Chief Justice states that as the object of the act was benevolent and did honor to the justice and humanity of Congress, the members of the Court were willing to sit as commissioners to examine and report upon pension claims; and they did so although Justice Wilson persistently refused to serve."

So that the honor of intimating the first act of Congress unconstitutional belongs to Chief Justice Jay and Justice James Wilson, of Pennsylvania. The Court has come a long way since that day, in the words of Jefferson, "ever active, with noiseless feet gaining little by little."

In the Dred Scott case, the Supreme Court held the Missouri Compromise Act of 1820 unconstitutional when the Congress had already repealed it 2 years previously. The decision holding unconstitutional that act which had been accepted and lived up to by the country for some 35 years, was wholly unnecessary, and many believe to this day that it was one of the influences that precipitated the Civil War.

INCOME-TAX DECISIONS

Mr. President, the decisions in the income-tax cases decided by the Supreme Court in the nineties were a huge mistake, a mistake which this country had to correct, but it took 20 years to correct the mistake.

It will be recalled that when the Congress again undertook to tax incomes and the case challenging the right of Congress to pass such a law came before the Supreme Court, Justice Shiras, of Pennsylvania, was on the Court at the time, and so was Justice Howell E. Jackson, of Tennessee. Justice Jackson had been ill and it was supposed that Justice Shiras was in favor of upholding the tax, and the Court was divided four to four without Justice Jackson. Before the case was decided, Justice Jackson became well enough to take part in the decision. He appeared and voted in favor of the validity of the tax; but it was claimed at the time in the newspapers that overnight Justice Shiras changed his opinion and voted against the validity of the tax, the act by Shiras' vote was held unconstitutional, and it took some 20 years to go through the constitutional procedure to invalidate that holding and to give Congress the power to tax incomes. It ruined the reputation and life of Justice Shiras, and deservedly so, and was a stigma on the Court itself.

Mr. President, this is not all. The constitutionality of such income-tax cases having been decided, one by a divided court, one by a 5-to-4 decision. The income-tax laws were all declared unconstitutional until we "immoral" Representatives and Senators, as some of us are now called, finally had to propose on amendment to the Constitution, which was ratified, giving power to Congress to tax incomes.

The attempts to tax incomes went along some 50 years before the right to tax was finally established. During most of these years we were constantly met with preliminary injunctions against such taxes, issued by district judges, the creatures of the Congress. These judges thought it was improper to tax high incomes, just as they thought it was immoral to prevent greed from exploiting the labor of little children; but the Congress did not think so, and I do not think so, Mr. President. I take great satisfaction in the record I have made in voting for and upholding every effort made to tax incomes in this country, and I want to say that when it comes to a question of morality, I would a thousand times rather be placed on the side of the little children of the country, on the side of the honest taxpayers of the country, rather than on the side of greed, monopoly, and great wealth, constantly fighting to escape just taxation.

And thus we see, Mr. President, that through nearly a half century efforts were made to impose a reasonable income tax on persons of large means, and, our Supreme Court declaring such acts unconstitutional, it took Congress nearly a half century to have these fair and just taxes imposed upon people who had the money with which to pay them, and then only after resort to the tedious and long process of having adopted an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator will recall that it was constitutional to have an income tax for about 60 years and then it became unconstitutional to have it for about 25 years and then again it came to be constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACK. So that it was constitutional when the Supreme Court said it was and it was unconstitutional when the Supreme Court said it was not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator, but it might be stated in just a little different way. When the proponents of constitutionality had five Judges out of the nine it was constitutional, and when the advocates of its unconstitutionality had five Judges out of the nine it was unconstitutional. In other words, it was just a question as to which side had the five Judges or a majority of the Court.

Mr. BLACK. In other words, the Constitution changed as the Judges changed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whenever a new President came into office and additional Judges were appointed to the bench, the Constitution at once was modified and changed. The only way we were able finally to put an income-tax law into effect was to provide by constitutional amendment, which no one could doubt, and we finally did it after a long fight of over half a century.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator will recall what I want to get clearly in the RECORD, to wit, that before the first opinion holding it was unconstitutional to have an income tax, it had been constitutional in this Nation for over 50 years. The Constitution itself had not changed. The writing was the same. The same charter was in the Library of Congress, and it was perfectly constitutional to have an income tax. Then along came five Judges who decided it was unconstitutional, and for 25 years, though the Constitution was still the same in the Library of Congress, it was a violation of the Constitution to collect an income tax. It is clear that the Constitution changes as the Judges change.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct.

N. R. A.

Mr. President, coming down to more recent dates, I think everybody concedes that the N. I. R. A. decision was a correct decision handed down by a united Court. It had the respect, if not the approval, of the country. If the N. R. A. bill had been drawn by the Senator and Congressman who introduced it, aided by the drafting boards of the two Houses, no doubt a bill would have been drawn that would have been entirely constitutional, and this probably would have been true of the first Guffey coal bill.

If bills of this character are to be brought into the Senate they ought to be passed upon by the lawyers of the Judiciary Committees and by the drafting boards in the first instance, and presented in that way.

PRIVATE LITIGATION

I think also the Supreme Court has the confidence and the approval of the people in its decisions generally in regard to litigation between private citizens where the invalidity of acts of Congress is not involved. On the other hand, in its decisions in passing on constitutional questions it does not now have and has never had the full confidence of the country, and now perhaps has less than it ever had. Its decrees on such questions have been quite generally in favor of powerful and entrenched interests of the country and against the masses of the people.

I now come to several classes who have not fared well at the hands of the Supreme Court. I first take up the farmers.

FARMERS

The Agricultural Adjustment Act decision was a blunder, and so were the most of the other decisions declaring acts of Congress void frequently decided by a 5-to-4 majority of the Court. The Court solemnly held that the regulation of the production of agricultural products was in violation of the Federal Constitution. The great body of these products go in interstate commerce. The production of agricultural products constitutes in reality and in truth the lifeblood of the Nation. Agriculture is the ground work of the material welfare of every person in our country. The Nation could not pay its debts without it. It could not provide for the common defense without it. It could not provide for the general welfare without it. It could not very well regulate foreign commerce without it. There would be virtually no necessity of regulating commerce among the several States but for agriculture.

The Nation could not raise and support armies without agriculture. It could not provide and maintain a navy without agriculture. It could not provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia without it, and finally it could not make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers without the power to regulate agriculture and to aid it, and to regulate those who are engaged in it. Under the great latitude allowed by our Constitution, the Congress has the right to legislate on agriculture.

The A. A. A. Act placed a tax on the processing of agricultural products, provided for voluntary agreements with producers for the reduction of acreage and for rental benefits, and the revenue from these payments was appropriated for the benefit of our farmers.

The one provision of the Constitution which made our National Government effective are the words:

Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes.

It is an unlimited power, without which the Goverment could not exist. It has been so held by our Supreme Court on innumerable occasions, and yet in annulling this act, which our Court apparently wanted to annul, the Court had to resort to the fallacy that this was not a tax at all within the meaning of the Constitution.

The Court then held that while the Congress had virtually an unlimited right to appropriate money under the general-welfare clause, yet the proposed appropriation of the money was a part of the scheme that was invalid, and therefore the act itself was invalid. Further, without any evidence to support the proposal at all, the Court held that the voluntary agreements made between the Secretary of Agriculture and farmers were involuntary, and were, therefore, invalid. In all the books a more biased or a more groundless decision could hardly be found.

In declaring the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional I believe the Supreme Court made its greatest blunder. The opinion itself was the Court's weakest production. Fortunately, the act had been in effect some 2 years before the Supreme Court passed on it; otherwise we might not be enjoying the great prosperity that is ours today. In my judgment the administration of that act while it was in force did more to do away with the depression than all other things combined. It restored the prices of farm products and made the farmers prosperous for the first time in many years. The decision of the Court was a body blow to the farmers of our country. In my judgment it was not a proper construction of the Constitution.

The three dissenting Justices in the A. A. A. case, in my judgment, were nearer right than the majority. All honor to Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo.

DIVIDED OPINIONS

These 5-to-4 and 3-to-6 decisions of the Supreme Court are most regrettable. They convince nobody and they have the approval of no one when they are brought in question. The Supreme Court itself ought to find some plan of abolishing such decisions. I doubt very much whether the Congress, though it has power to make such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary as to appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, can make a rule that would justly operate in all cases.

How can the ordinary American citizen know what the law is? The Agricultural Adjustment Act, an act which does more for agriculture than any other act passed by Congress, was brought before the Court, and by a decision of 6 to 3 of the nine most learned Judges in the world the act was declared invalid, six of them saying it was bad and three of them saying it was good. How can the wayfaring citizen of America know what the law is under such circumstances? How much greater is his trouble if he knows that some future change in the Court would change the Constitution at once? How can any lawyer know what the Constitution means under such opinions?

When the Court divides 5 to 4 it is inconceivable that both majority and minority can be right. If nine of the most learned judges in all the world divide 5 to 4, or even 3 to 6, on any law, how can any other American citizen know what the law really is?

These 5-to-4 decisions are more hurtful to the prestige of the Court than anything any outsider might do or say. They lead many people to say that the decisions are arrived at in pride of opinion or in anger or in ill will or in resentment. Knowing the members of the Supreme Court as I know them, I am sure this is not so; but it seems to me that the members of the Court should find some way to do away with the majority opinions known as 5-to-4 decisions. They owe it to themselves to do so. In the end it will destroy the usefulness of the Court if continued.

LABOR

I have spoken of farmers. I now come to labor.

The Congress, by act of June 27, 1934, passed a railroad retirement measure. Here was an act to retire aged employees. The United States Government, by act of Congress, had already long since put in force a retirement act for its own aged employees. It had worked well; but as soon as the Railroad Retirement Act was passed the railroads brought suit to enjoin its enforcement, and a district judge promptly granted an injunction. The matter was taken to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court held the law unconstitutional, and thus the aged employees of the railroads were deprived of the just benefits of a badly needed act. The great latitude of the Constitution was ample to justify upholding such an act; but the Court, by a 5-to-4 decision, declared the act unconstitutional and void. Again I say, all honor to Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo for dissenting! Who can say what was the real interpretation of the Constitution with five of the greatest judges in the world voting one way and four voting the other way? For my part, I believe again that the minority members of the Court were right.

Again, by the act of August 30, 1935, known as the Guffey Coal Act, the rights of those who labor in the coal mines were again sought to be protected; and again by a decision of 5 to 4 the act was nullified. Chief Justice Hughes, Justices Cardozo, Brandeis, and Stone dissented.

Again, but recently—and I call the attention of the Senate especially to this act—nine of the greatest jurists in all the world, having amended the Constitution by assuming the right to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress, had before them the Minimum Wage case coming from New York, as I remember. The Court held the State statute void on the ground that the States had no jurisdiction to fix minimum wages. They had already held that the United States Congress had no jurisdiction to fix minimum wages; and therefore, under this decision of the Court, we are in the remarkable situation that neither State legislatures nor the National Legislature have a right to fix minimum wages in this country.

WOMEN

I first talked about the farmer cases, then about the labor cases. I now come to legislation affecting women.

Mr. President, on September 19, 1918, the Congress passed what was known as the minimum-wage law for women here in the District of Columbia, the purpose being to secure for women workers such wages as would maintain them in good health and protect their morals. Under the Constitution, as we all know, the Congress has complete jurisdiction over everything in the District of Columbia; but the forces of greed immediately carried the case into the courts, and secured from a district judge an injunction prohibiting the execution of the act. The matter was carried to the Supreme Court, and is reported in Two Hundred and Sixty-first United States Reports, 525. The Supreme Court promptly declared the law unconstitutional because the standard prescribed—namely, to maintain women in good health—was too vague for practical application, and because there was no connection between morality and wages for women.

The act was held unconstitutional because it was impracticable, and because there was not any connection between low wages and morality among women! To their great honor be it said. Chief Justice Taft and Justices Holmes and Sanford dissented. Who can possibly know what the law is, or what the Constitution means, when nine of the greatest doctors of law in all the world disagree?

CHILD LABOR

I next come to child labor. Remember these pronouncements of the Supreme Court on constitutional grounds, first regarding labor; next as to farming; next as to women. Now comes child labor.

Mr. President, take the case of child labor, which was in such general use among the mills of our country, and was especially prevalent in the cotton and woolen mills of our country some 25 or 30 years ago. It had become an abomination.

I remember that in 1911, while on an automobile trip, we entered a little mill town at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon in the summertime. There were two automobiles in our party. There was a great cotton factory in the town, and after the 5 o'clock whistle blew, hundreds and hundreds of employees came filing out.

Most of them were children, white-faced, dull-eyed, dusty-haired, anemic, and unhealthy- and hungry-looking children of various ages from 8 to 16 years of age. Ill-clothed and ill-fed were these children. The sight brought tears to the eyes of a number of my party. I was not then in public office, but I made up my mind then and there that if ever I had an opportunity to aid in the prevention of such a system I would do everything in my power to prevent child labor in the factories of America.

The occasion soon arose. I was sent to the Congress in the same year, in 1911; and I had not been there long before the opportunity was given to vote on a bill prohibiting child labor. The bill was passed by the Congress. It went to President Taft, as I remember, and he vetoed it, and our then efforts were in vain. Later a similar bill was repassed by the Congress, and it went to President Wilson, and he signed it. Immediately one of the great concerns pecuniarily interested in the labor of little children, actuated by greed, as I believe, filed a bill alleging the unconstitutionality of that measure; and a district Federal judge granted an injunction, and later the Supreme Court upheld it by a 5-to-4 decision.

But that was not all. A short time before, Congress had passed another of what are called by some of my friends "immoral" acts, known as the Phosphorus Match Act. It had developed that in manufacturing phosphorus matches the workmen engaged in the manufacture of the matches were injured and soon brought to their death by the deadly poisons used in making the matches; and the Congress of the United States "immorally" undertook to rectify this situation by putting a tax on phosphorus matches. The forces of greed again objected, and that case came before the Supreme Court, and, to the honor of the Court, it was decided against the forces of greed.

Many of us thought that if we could not use the interstate-commerce clause to protect helpless little children from being employed in these mills we could perhaps follow the Phosphorus Match case by putting a tax on the goods made by little children and in that way prevent their employment. We thought our action in attempting to protect little children from these pecuniarily greedy factories was a moral thing to do, but it seems that it was not. We passed that act. It went before a district judge. He held the act invalid on the ground that it was unconstitutional. The case went to the Supreme Court, and that Court, by a divided Court, held that the act was unconstitutional. Precedents are not binding on the Court where the safety of little children are involved.

Then, having failed twice, once under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and the second time, under the power to tax, having failed to protect the children, Congress passed a joint resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to give Congress the right to legislate on the subject of child labor. That joint resolution was passed by more than a two-thirds majority in each House. I am a little hesitant in undertaking to fix the exact date of that action——

Mr. HUGHES. It was 1913.

Mr. McKELLAR. The able and distinguished Senator from Delaware states that it was in 1913; and we have been attempting to have that amendment ratified by the necessary 36 States ever since, but have the ratification of only 26 States. We hope the other 10 will ratify.

Mr. MOORE. Is there a law in the Senator's State fixing the age at which children may go to work? We do not have child labor in New Jersey factories.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, there is a law in my State and it does protect to a great extent, but in many States there is little protection of children.

I am glad to hear New Jersey protects them. I think great reforms have been made by some of the States themselves. But a general law prohibiting child labor as a menace to the health and even to the lives of little children has not been passed in this country and child labor will never be eradicated until Congress enacts a law prohibiting it. And under the decisions of our Supreme Court we can enact no law till we amend the Constitution, and this takes a long, long time, as the friends of little children have found out.

For more than 30 years the fight has gone on in Congress. The Congress passed the first law on the subject more than 20 years ago, and still, by reason of the 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court, we have not been able to perform the humane and highly moral service of protecting the little children of America from the avarice and greed of those who would exploit them. Those acts of Congress were not unconstitutional. Under the wide latitude given in the Constitution there was not the slightest doubt about the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes, Justice McKenna, Justice Brandeis, and Justice Clarke being the correct decision in the case. Such a humane act of Congress protecting little children from greed and avarice was not one which required the great Court to invoke the ancient subtleties of the law, the doubtful precedents of a departed past, or the intricate niceties of judicial conception to render it nugatory. The Court had assumed the power to pass on it. One Judge out of nine really decided it. Who could say whether the decision of the majority or the minority was right? Looked at not as a mere abstraction of the law, but outside of it, looked at in reason, humanity, equity, and with a proper regard for future citizenship, for the teachings of the Savior of mankind concerning little children, I believe all these combine to make the opinion of the minority legal and binding. And yet, by reason of this 5-to-4 decision, untold thousands of little children are suffering in body and in mind this very day.

Can it be said to be "immoral" for Congress to pass such acts as these Child Labor Acts? If so, I must confess my ignorance of what is moral and what is immoral, for I believe with all my heart that these acts of the Congress on child labor were moral in every essential; and looking to the future of our citizenship in this country, I think they were the most desirable acts that could possibly have been passed.

Does someone refer to the immorality of denying this power to a district judge? I point to the greater immorality of decisions prohibiting the saving of the health and the lives of little children. Talk about the irreparable injury that comes to property if the right of injunction is modified. I talk about the protection of lives of little children and the protection of their happiness, of their welfare, and of their health, and even their lives.

But when it came to the poor and helpless, to the farmers, to the laborers, to the women, and even to the little children in their fights against greed and avarice, our Supreme Court has turned its thumbs down on them. It has rejected the great laws made in their behalf. It rejected as unconstitutional and invalid the laws protecting farmers and agriculture, the laws protecting labor, the laws protecting the workingwomen of our land, and even the laws protecting the little helpless children of the land against the hands of greed and avarice that would exploit them.

Mr. President, this is the record. I had never before examined the whole record with the care with which I have recently examined it. Dr. George J. Schulz, of the Congressional Library, has had printed a digest of opinions of the Supreme Court holding acts of Congress unconstitutional, and I commend the document he has prepared to every Senator, it makes no difference on which side he is. I ask Senators to look at this statement as to the 5-to-4 decisions, the 6-to-3 decisions, and even the 7-to-2 decisions, and see how our courts have uniformly stood by the vested interests and against the laboring men, the farmers, the women, and the children. It will be worth the while of Senators to look at this document, one of the most interesting and important documents ever printed, and I take this occasion to congratulate the distinguished and learned Assistant Librarian on his excellent work.

These 73 decisions in cases in which acts of Congress were set aside tell a pathetic story. They all show that, as badly as we needed a new deal for the economic welfare of our country, we need a new deal more in the regulation of our judicial system. I am not complaining of any judge. I have said before, and I say again, I think these judges are conscientious and are performing their duty as they see it, but after going over these cases I must say that on some occasions we have a misguided majority of the Court.

THE COURT VERSUS THE CONGRESS AND THE EXECUTIVE

Mr. President, the contest between the President and the Congress on the one side and the Supreme Court on the other is just about as old as our Nation. The Supreme Court semiofficially snubbed President Washington.

The fight between the Court, led by Chief Justice Marshall and President Jefferson, is known of all historians. It was bitter, and continued until President Jefferson's death. President Jefferson always thought that the Supreme Court assumed too much power.

Substantially the same fight went on between President Jackson and the Court. His expression in the Georgia case was substantially the following:

John Marshall has decided this case; let him enforce his decision.

Lincoln frequently assailed the Court and its decisions. The Supreme Court was in position greatly to embarrass the Government during the Civil War in either of two ways. It might have held that the conflict was not a war and not covered by the laws of war, that prizes had been illegally taken by the Navy and foreign credit with southern ports illegally broken up. Such a decision would have made the Government liable for huge sums in damages, and its psychological effects would have been such as to seriously cripple the conduct of the war. The opinion of the majority of the Court delivered on March 10, 1863, by Justice Grier, Justice Wayne, and Mr. Lincoln's three appointees was all the administration could have desired. At that time Mr. Lincoln had already appointed three members of the Court, and he was charged with packing the Court.

The controversy between President Johnson and the Court is also well known. The celebrated case of McCardle, a Mississippi editor, is here recalled. He was arrested by military order for opposition to reconstruction. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the United States circuit court charging that military reconstruction was unconstitutional. The military commander refused to obey the writ and held the prisoner. An appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court and, after argument of 4 days by some of the ablest lawyers in America, the Court decided that it had jurisdiction and must pass upon the issue. But before the day of hearing Congress repealed the law allowing appeals in such cases and the Supreme Court bowed in silence.

In Speaking of the McCardle suit, Judge Curtis said:

Congress by the acquiescence of the people overcame the President and subdued the Supreme Court.

I have already spoken of the trouble between President Grant and the Court. Again, when Theodore Roosevelt was President, he had innumerable clashes with the Court. He advocated amendments to the Constitution for the recall of judges. Finally we have the present controversy between the President and the Supreme Court.

THE PRESENT CONTROVERSY

The present controversy is the outgrowth of differences of opinion about government, which differences arose in the beginning of our history as a nation and have continued down to the present date.

Our Federal courts have at all times been reactionary. Our judges being lawyers, it has been perfectly natural for them to stand by previous decisions and precedents. They look to the past for inspiration rather than to the future. They cling to old ideas and old ideals. Throughout their existence their decisions as to political rights have leaned always to the established order of things. In this way Federal courts have become the natural haven of the vested interests. They have become the sword and the shield of great corporate interests, of all the mammoth utility corporations, of all the aggregations of finance and of industry, and of what is commonly known as entrenched wealth.

Probably unconsciously, but nevertheless effectively, Federal courts have stood against innovations and changes in our Government, and their decisions show that they have checkmated these changes wherever possible. They never liked the rule of the masses of the people and hence their opposition to men like Jefferson and Jackson. Before the Civil War they could not help showing their political preference for the established order of things. After the Civil War they did not seem to understand that a revolution had taken place in our country, and it took them a long time to adjust themselves to the new regime.

Then came their decisions in favor of the wealthy and powerful; their decisions against the just imposition of income taxes; their continued upholding of the great corporate interests as against the people. Again, as the country developed and as the Congress kept pace with it with remedial legislation, more and more the reactionary courts struck down these progressive measures passed in the interest of human beings.

They declared unconstitutional and invalid, as I have before pointed out, humane legislation in favor of the farmers.

They declared invalid much-needed legislation in the interest of the workingwomen of the country.

They voided absolutely the acts of Congress passed in the interest of the laboring men.

More than all, over all, and above all, it seems to have been their determination to prevent any interference with the right of great industries to employ little children in their factories. This fight of the Court against the little children has been the longest and bitterest of them all and it is still going on.

ROOSEVELT'S POLICIES

When Franklin Roosevelt became President, reactionary policies, almost invariably upheld by the Federal courts, had reached their full fruition. They had brought our Government to the verge of disaster. Many thought they had brought our Government to the verge of revolution. President Roosevelt rose to the occasion. He believed, as I believe, that our Constitution is a flexible document and that it allows the greatest latitude in the judicial interpretation of constitutional questions; and thereupon he recommended, and the Congress passed, what is known as the New Deal legislation. Our reactionary Federal courts have struck down much of this legislation. Fortunately, before it was struck down it had accomplished much good, and had really restored the country to prosperity. The President favored this legislation. The Congress had overwhelmingly passed this legislation. The people have overwhelmingly approved this legislation. The reactionaries had been disregarded. The reactionary policies of Mr. Hoover had been nullified. Even the reactionary great interests saw that a change had taken place in the prevailing thought of the country, and had accepted the conditions.

Our Federal courts, the Supreme Court acting by a majority however, perhaps unconsciously but at the same time most effectively, had not given up the fight. They virtually vetoed the policies of the New Deal under their assumed power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional.

Mr. President, a great economic and social revolution has taken place in America, and in my judgment the real reason why our Federal courts have declared the acts of the New Deal unconstitutional is that they have not understood the effect of this revolution.

THE REAL ISSUE

The real issue is not a fight between President Roosevelt and the Federal courts. It is a fight between outworn and outlived reactionary policies of government and the modern policies of real democracy and real freedom. President Roosevelt is the leader of the modern ideal and the modern policy. The Supreme Court is the last bulwark of an outlived reactionism. It is a fight between the two systems. It is not a fight between individuals. The Constitution is but an instrument in the fight, and it is often used as a smoke screen. This idea could not be better illustrated than by the words of Justice Roberts in the A. A. A. case, in which he said as to laws passed by Congress and sought to be invalidated—

When such a contention—

Meaning a contention as to invalidity of an act of Congress—

When such a contention comes here, we naturally require a showing that by no reasonable possibility can the challenged legislation fall within the wide range of discretion permitted to the Congress.

This expression comes from Mr. Justice Roberts, who held the Agricultural Adjustment Act invalid. He says that no act can be held invalid if there is any reasonable possibility of its being within the wide range of jurisdiction of Congress. Yet, in spite of the fact that the Congress of the United States, each member of which is sworn to uphold the Constitution, voted for the legislation; that the President, who is likewise sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States, approved the legislation, and that three members of Mr. Justice Roberts' own Court earnestly contended and argued that the legislation was within the wide range of discretion permitted to the Congress—and in spite of all that, he held the act invalid. He found no reasonable possibility that the act was valid, even though the act, after being passed by Congress, was approved by the President, and was held valid by three members of the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, the American people by the unprecedented majority of more than 11,000,000 votes have upheld what is known as the New Deal legislation.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S POSITION

Having been elected by the enormous majority of 11,000,000 votes, what was the President to do in these circumstances? He had advocated, and the Congress had passed, this New Deal legislation. The reactionaries had cried out against it, and had submitted it to the courts. The Federal courts had largely destroyed it. The issue that went before the American people last fall was the New Deal, and the President won. What was he to do? Was he to quit the fight or was he to carry on? Was he to remain silent after the people had decided in his favor? Was he to remain silent after his legislation had been destroyed? I doubt if anyone expected him to do that. There was but one thing that he could do, and that was to make effective the results of the economic revolution, of which he was the leader.

HIS PLAN

Many thought he was going to support amendments to the Constitution giving to the Congress the express power to deal with agriculture, industry, and the hours of labor. He was abused on every stump for his supposed amendments to the Constitution. His plan proposes no such thing. It proposes a strict compliance with the Constitution. It proposes such a strict compliance with the Constitution as has been already upheld by precedent and by the courts. He simply proposes to add to the membership of the Supreme Court and the circuit courts of the United States, and that is substantially all. He wishes to infuse new blood into our courts. His plan is perfectly reasonable, perfectly constitutional, and easy and quick of execution. There is nothing revolutionary about the plan. There is no interference with any constitutional guaranty. It does not change the Constitution one iota.

PACKING THE COURT

But it is claimed by our reactionary friends that to give President Roosevelt the power to appoint six Judges is subversive of the Supreme Court. Such a contention is wholly unsound. President Washington appointed 10 Judges, President Jackson appointed 5; President Lincoln 5; President Grant 4; President Taft 6. We had no revolution on those occasions; we had no breaking down of the Supreme Court when President Taft appointed six members of the Court. Why should anybody assume that because a President has within two terms the right to appoint six members of the Supreme Court it is subversive of the Supreme Court? Or that he is packing the Court? President Harding appointed four in a little more than 2 years, and even President Hoover appointed three. None of these appointees to the Court destroyed the Court, and if Mr. Roosevelt is allowed to appoint six, that will be no more than Mr. Taft appointed in one term.

In speaking of the appointment of Judges, only four Presidents did not have the opportunity of appointing a Supreme Court Judge. As I said a little while ago, these are William Henry Harrison, who lived only about a month; Zachary Taylor, who served a year and 4 months; and Andrew Johnson, who served practically a full term but was not permitted to make an appointment; and Franklin Roosevelt, who has served more than a term without making an appointment.

It is fair to say that Mr. Madison in his second term, Mr. Monroe in his first term, and Mr. Wilson in his second term did not appoint Justices, but it is a peculiar fact that with six Justices over 70 years of age with the privilege to retire, none have retired in the first 4 years of Mr. Roosevelt's administration.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator have the record there of the number of Judges who retired shortly after President Woodrow Wilson's second term, after Mr. Harding and Mr. Daugherty came into office?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have just called attention to the fact that, although President Harding served only a little more than 2 years, just a little more than half of one term, he appointed four Judges to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator have the record showing how many of those appointments were because of previous resignations?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not.

Mr. BLACK. My recollection is that three of them were due to resignations which occurred shortly after the second term of President Woodrow Wilson; but, of course, if those resignations had happened during President Wilson's term and he had filled the vacancies, the 5-to-4 might have been on the other side on various questions, and our farmers, workers, and people might now be protected by laws declared by the Supreme Court to be constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would have been an awful thing if the Court ever had five real Democrats on it. I presume not only the Supreme Court would have gone to the bow-wows under such circumstances but that the whole country, in the eyes of the reactionaries, would have likewise gone to the bow-wows if we had ever had five real Democrats on the Court.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator, of course, is referring to the fact that if the personnel of the Court had happened from death or resignation to be altered by one Justice only, and this different Court majority had held these laws within the Constitution which the present 5-to-4 Justices held unconstitutional, we would have actually been living under constitutional laws, which are now judicially unconstitutional, just as we lived under legal tender law for many years, which five men once said was unconstitutional. We lived and functioned as a people under income-tax laws held constitutional for about a century, and later, by a 5-to-4 opinion, the people were told that a graduated income tax savored of communism, and then the law which had been constitutional for a century was unconstitutional for 25 years. Truly, the Constitution was not what its framers wrote, but what the Judges from time to time said the framers meant.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Alabama is entirely correct, and I thank him for his contribution.

I now come to a more important consideration in connection with the appointment of the six Judges, if they should be appointed. Where does this charge of packing the Court lead us to? It leads us not only to a charge that the President is going to pack the Court, but that the Senate is going to pack the Court. It is a charge against the integrity, the good sense, and the conscience of the Senate, for we all know that the President cannot pack the Court without the consent and approval of this body. It is idle to say that the Senate will agree to whatever the Executive recommends. Nominations of Supreme Court Justices have been rejected by this very body, and I am proud that is its history. I do not believe, and I think no Senator believes, that the Members of this body would join any Executive in packing the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator referred to the "packing", which seems to have become a very popular term; and I assume that the term is intended to imply that someone, by particular action, causes Justices to be on the bench who otherwise would not be on the bench.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is aware, of course, that it would be possible for the Judges themselves to retire or resign and thereby cause Judges to be placed on the bench who otherwise would not be on the bench? Under that definition such action could be tantamount to "packing the Court" by the Judges themselves. Of course, I do not mean to imply anything with reference to the Court at this time, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in a recent biography published last year there was quoted a letter written by a Judge who served about 75 years ago in which the Judge said he was being compelled to serve longer than he desired. He said that he wished to wait until his party got in power. Of course, he was acting within his constitutional rights and doubtless believed his action to be best for his country; but if packing the Court means to take action that alters the natural creation of vacancies, this timing of his resignation will doubtless be termed "packing the Court" by some of those who now use the term so fluently.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator, and he will be interested in the expression of one or two of our Presidents and several members of our Supreme Court to which I will call his attention in a moment. However, before leaving this point let me repeat that the charge of packing the Court is not only a charge that the President of the United States is going to pack the Court but that the Senate is going to help him pack the Court. That is a charge that I resent, for I do not think any Senator would help anybody pack the Court with a Judge who is not the proper kind of man to be a Judge, who is not an honest man and not a faithful student of the law. And I do not think our splendid President would engage in any such business. No man nominated for a place on the Supreme Court bench can be placed there unless his nomination is confirmed by the Senate, and surely the Senate will not agree to the packing of the Court. Mr. Taft appointed six Justices. Nobody thinks he packed the Court. I think there is absolutely nothing in the contention.

Nobody thinks that he packed the Court.

It was charged because General Grant put two Justices on the Court that he packed the Court, but if those who are interested in the history of the transaction will examine a document written by the late George F. Hoar, a distinguished former Senator from the State of Massachusetts, which gives a complete history of the transaction, they will reach no other conclusion but that in President Grant's day, as in President Taft's day, as in President Lincoln's day, and as in the day of every other President, there has been no packing of the Court by any President. Nor will there be a packing of the Court by our present President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume that any President having the power of appointment, in looking over the field from which to select members of the Supreme Court, would be actuated in his selections by his conception of the fitness of the man or the men whom he intended to honor with such an appointment, and it would not be at all strange if he appointed somebody who had a view of the law and of the Constitution that might be somewhat in harmony with his own view. I recall that in the Wilson administration a distinguished judge from the State of Kentucky was an applicant for appointment to the Supreme Court. The entire Kentucky delegation went to the White House and interviewed the President, each member of the delegation presenting his estimate of this distinguished Kentucky judge. When we had all concluded, President Wilson asked this significant question: "Gentlemen, does your candidate believe that the law grows, or does he take the legalistic view that it is finished?" In that interrogation he revealed to us the type of man he desired to appoint to the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely; and no better rule was ever announced by any President.

Mr. BARKLEY. No more profound question was ever asked any delegation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. And yet I assume that, having such a conception of the sort of men who ought to be appointed to the Supreme Court, the fact that he followed it up with the appointment of that sort of men might equally be said to be a packing of the Court by the President with men who had that forward-looking view of the interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Since the Senator has been interrupted, let me suggest in that connection that during the Civil War period, when we were fighting for our existence as a Nation and certain acts had been passed carrying out the war policy, President Lincoln was very much concerned about the constitutionality of what he had done. There occurred a vacancy in the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. In considering the appointment of Mr. Chase to fill that vacancy, which he did eventually fill, Lincoln said, "We want a Chief Justice who will uphold what we have done with reference to the War Act, the Emancipation Act, and the Legal Tender Act."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true. I wonder if the Senator would object if I should add another word about Chief Justice Chase. He was appointed Chief Justice by Mr. Lincoln. He was in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet before he was appointed Chief Justice. He was Secretary of the Treasury in 1862 and recommended to the Congress that what is known as the Legal Tender Act should be passed. He prepared the bill in the Treasury Department. I do not know that, as passed, it was in form prepared there, but all of its provisions were originally formulated there and it was introduced with his full consent and approval and at his instigation. Afterwards he was appointed to the Supreme Court bench and that act came to the Supreme Court for determination. Mr. Chase was one of those who voted to hold it unconstitutional when as a matter of fact he had prepared the original bill.

Packing the Court? If Mr. Lincoln undertook to pack the Court with Chief Justice Chase he certainly made a big mistake. I do not believe he undertook to do it.

I am not casting aspersions on any judge. I do not want it to be thought that I am casting any aspersions on the memory of Mr. Chase. I merely mean to say that Mr. Chase prepared the original bill, secured its passage and enactment into law as best he could, operated under the act for more than a year, and then afterward went on the Supreme Court bench in 1869 or 1870, and later joined in declaring it unconstitutional.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if he has at any point in his remarks a quotation of a statement by ex-President William Howard Taft?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not.

Mr. BLACK. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact with reference to a statement made by President Taft. So far as I know President Taft's purity of motive and cleanness of heart had never been questioned by anyone.

Mr. McKELLAR. No one who knew him ever did so.

Mr. BLACK. He was a man of ability, a man of integrity, and a man who had a philosophy and stood for that philosophy. I invite attention to the fact that during the campaign between Mr. Harding and Mr. Cox, President Taft wrote an article for the Yale Law Journal. In the article he stated in substance that the greatest domestic issue which confronted the people of the United States in that compaign was as to whether Harding or Cox should select Supreme Court Justices, where appointments might have to be made in the near future. He said this was important particularly because President Wilson's supporters had a tendency to incline to socialistic or communistic tendencies and to give undue powers to organized labor. President Taft then said that what the country needed was Judges who would protect the property of the people of the United States under the due-process clause, and that Harding could be better trusted to do this than Cox.

The Senator will recall that in practically all the cases to which he has referred the controversy had arisen over what comes within the due-process clause. That clause is wholly incapable of definition. No one has ever defined it. No one ever has marked its boundaries. It is as elastic as rubber. What President Taft really meant was that the due-process clause of the Constitution of the United States was what the Judge construing it thought it was. What he further implied was that he wanted Judges who would construe the due-process clause to mean what he, Mr. Taft, thought the clause ought to mean.

No reflection is intended on those Presidents who appoint Supreme Court Judges who, in interpreting this elastic due-process clause, which means one thing to one citizen and another thing to another citizen, have the philosophy which is the then prevailing sentiment of the country.

President Taft did not dispute it. President Taft accepted and emphasized it as an issue in a Presidential campaign. After that campaign three new Judges were added to the Supreme Court. As a result many 5-to-4 opinions have been written by the Supreme Court in which the five Judges interpreted the due-process clause in line with the predilections of that great man—and I call him a great man although I disagreed with his policies—President Taft.

I invite attention to that fact in connection with others as an illustration of the fact that even President Taft—whom all agree had the purest instincts and the most honorable and upright and patriotic motives—was willing to say to the country that the great domestic issue in a Presidential campaign was the economic philosophy and predilections of the Judges who were to sit in the Supreme Court and make final and unappealable decisions as to national policies, by an application of those predilections to the due-process clause of the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. MINTON. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that there is no historian or anyone else who condemns President Grant today for doing what he did with reference to filling vacancies on the Supreme Court when he appointed Justices Bradley and Strong.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have already said so.

Mr. MINTON. At that time, as the Senator knows, the Legal Tender Act was the burning issue of the day. When Grant placed those men on the bench he saw to it that he got two men who would sustain the act. It so happened that the act had already been declared unconstitutional by a vote of 4 to 3. When those two Judges came to the bench the Court reversed the previous opinion and declared the act constitutional by a vote of 5 to 4, and one of those two Justices wrote the opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and the country has sustained it since. More than that—though I, perhaps, ought not to say this, because I desire to avoid all reference to politics in any manner or form in this discussion—I recall, and I believe correctly, that Mr. Justice Strong had been chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania and had had this very act before him and had declared it constitutional. Mr. Bradley, of New Jersey, who was appointed also by President Grant, had represented certain large concerns which were interested in the act. He had given them a formal opinion holding that the act was constitutional, so there was no question about the view of these two appointees, so far as he was concerned.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Am I to understand the Senator from Tennessee to state that he approves what President Grant did at that time?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not necessary to approve it or disapprove it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator did approve it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just giving the historical facts.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not trying to get into a colloquy with the Senator, but I thought he answered the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the effect that no one now complains of what President Grant did.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did say that. I have never read a complaint about it since that time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator think President Grant did right?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see how he could have done anything else. Let me tell the Senator why I think so. There was no gold or silver in this country at that time. The Government could not coin gold or silver because there was none. It was all gone on account of the war. If he had not done what he did we might have gone into bankruptcy or into a revolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that the Senator from Texas thinks the last legal-tender decision was right. He thinks it was correct from a legal standpoint. What the Senator from Texas was interested in was whether or not the Senator from Tennessee approves what President Grant did, which the Senator now admits was to appoint two judges whose minds were already made up to sit on the Court for the purpose of reversing a particular decision. If that was right in that case, why would it not be right in any case, whenever the Court does not rule as we think it ought to rule, for Congress to put on another judge, and thus have the Court change its opinion?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think what was done has worked out all right. Whatever the condition may have been at the beginning, it has worked out all right. Whatever opinion was expressed to the contrary has long since lapsed into innocuous desuetude, and we have nothing to deal with but what is before us.

BUSINESS OF THE COURT

Again, it is claimed that the Supreme Court is up with its docket, and for this reason that it is not necessary to appoint any additional judges. Technically, this may be correct; but what the President states as the reason for the proposed change is that last year 803 applications for review of cases in the Supreme Court were filed, and only 108 of the cases were heard by the Court. I think the President is entirely correct in this. All of these applications should either be heard or they should have a chance to be heard by the full Court. If they are to be heard, or even most of them are to be heard, by the Court, an increase of the Court is necessary.

CRITICISMS OF THE SUPREME COURT

Some persons claim that no lawyer or legislator should even criticize the Court. Just criticism cannot hurt the Court or its members or any one else. Besides, the Court has been criticized by practically all of our strong Presidents except Presidents Cleveland and Wilson. I have not run across any criticism of the Court by those two Presidents, but here are some of the criticisms that have come to me:

Mr. Jefferson, at various times while he was President and afterward criticized the Supreme Court. In a letter to Spencer Roane he said:

> The great object of my fear is the Federal judiciary. That body, like gravity, ever active, with noiseless foot gaining ground step by step and holding what it gains, is engulfing insidiously the special governments into the jaws of that which feeds them.

To William Johnson, he wrote in 1823, just a few years before he died:

> There is no danger I apprehend so much as the consolidation of our Government by the noiseless and therefore unalarming instrumentality of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is not true, however, that Mr. Jefferson attacked the Supreme Court not because it declared unconstitutional acts of Congress, but because it maintained acts of Congress, and therefore was bringing about the consolidation of which he spoke?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no!

Mr. CONNALLY. Did not Mr. Jefferson attack the Supreme Court because it upheld acts of Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. He attacked it on both grounds—both on the ground that it unconstitutionally interfered with State courts and acts of State legislatures, and on the ground that it went wholly outside of the Constitution in making its decisions. As I recall, no greater criticism ever came from Mr. Jefferson or any one else than his criticism of Chief Justice Marshall in his celebrated dictum in the case of Marbury against Madison in 1803.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that Mr. Jefferson attacked the Supreme Court because it upheld the alien and sedition laws?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was one of the grounds of his criticism.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that he attacked the Supreme Court not because it declared unconstitutional but because it maintained the National Bank Act in McCulloch against Maryland?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I think not. I think the Senator is mistaken. If I recall my history aright—and I may not do so, I do not make this assertion with positiveness—President Jefferson very much approved the decision in McCulloch against Maryland.

Mr. CONNALLY. There was a prior case in which the Supreme Court upheld the bank act, of which Mr. Jefferson did complain.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The bank case I am now speaking of is the one involving the tax on Federal banks. The Senator has quoted a letter from Mr. Jefferson to Justice Johnson.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that Justice Johnson was an appointee of Mr. Jefferson, and that Justice Johnson went on the bench when he was only 36 years of age, and that one of the first things he did after he got on the bench was to rule adversely to Mr. Jefferson in the case in which Jefferson had advised and instructed collectors of customs to hold up all bills of lading on certain foreign commerce? Is it not true that Justice Johnson held that Mr. Jefferson did not have that authority under the law, and that Mr. Jefferson's complaint of the Court was that it was maintaining the Constitution and not overruling it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can hardly imagine that that can be the case, for the reason that the letter from which I am quoting is written to Justice Johnson in the most friendly and delightful fashion, as if he and Mr. Jefferson had always been friends.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky in just a minute. Let me reply further to the question of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. Jefferson became President on the 4th of March 1801. He was President for 8 years, and lived until the 4th of July 1826. If the Senator will look at Mr. Jefferson's writings—and they were numerous—he will find in every single one of those years criticism of what Mr. Jefferson called the "noiseless action" of the Supreme Court in taking on additional authority all through the years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The point the Senator from Tennessee is making is that, beginning with Jefferson, many Presidents have criticized the action of the Supreme Court. It makes little difference whether that criticism was based upon the action of the Court in holding some act of Congress constitutional or in holding it unconstitutional. It is a matter of opinion as between the critic and the Court. So far as the propriety or justice of the criticism is concerned, the fact that the decision might have been for or against the constitutionality of an act of Congress really has no bearing upon the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. It certainly has not in this case, for the additional reason that no act was held unconstitutional at that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is true that Chief Justice Marshall, in Marbury against Madison, wrote a dictum—not a decision but a dictum, which he afterward admitted was a dictum—declaring the act, in his judgment, unconstitutional. That, however, was the only case of the kind; and no court ever undertook to hold any act of Congress unconstitutional until 1856, in the Dred Scott case, when Chief Justice Taney held unconstitutional an act which had already been repealed by the Congress of the United States 2 years before.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Many, if not most, of Mr. Jefferson's criticisms of Chief Justice Marshall were based on the fact that Marshall was maintaining the existence and the expansion of Federal powers dealing with public matters. In spite of that, is it not historically true that while Mr. Jefferson was President, in many respects he changed his own views with respect to that subject, and in a number of instances advocated the exercise of Federal powers which he had previously said did not exist?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have here the excerpts from Mr. Jefferson, which I will finish reading.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I regret somewhat to interrupt and mar the symmetry of what I think in the main is evidence of admirable and correct research on the part of the Senator from Tennessee; and if my interruption—which may be 3 or 4 minutes in length—would break or disjoint his speech, I shall not make it. I have here some matter, however——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have only a very little more to say; and, if the Senator will indulge me, I should like to finish, because I desire to keep together, as far as I can, especially the opinions of Mr. Jefferson and of members of the Court.

Mr. ASHURST. I understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Again, in 1820 Mr. Jefferson wrote to William C. Jarvis, as follows:

> It is a very dangerous doctrine to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all questions. It is one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy.

I call the especial attention of those who are interested in politics to this letter.

In 1810 Mr. Jefferson wrote to Albert Gallatin, who was then Secretary of the Treasury and had been such under Jefferson:

> At length we have a chance of getting a Republican majority—

Meaning, of course, a Democratic majority, because what was known at that time as the Republican Party was actually the Democratic Party—> in the supreme judiciary. For 10 years has that branch bridged the spirit and will of the Nation, after the Nation had manifested its will by a complete reform in every branch depending on them.

And again, in a letter to Caesar A. Romney, the date of which I have not here, Mr. Jefferson said:

> The death of Associate Justice Cushing gives an opportunity for at length getting a Republican—> majority on the Supreme Court bench. Ten years has the anticivism of that body been bidding defiance to the spirit of the whole Nation if they had manifested their will by reforming every other branch of government. I trust the occasion will not be lost. Nothing is more material than to complete the reformation of the Government by this appointment.

Meaning a Democratic—

We have already seen that Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln frequently criticized the Court.

No less a person than Charles Sumner, who surely could not be called an anarchist or an enemy of law and order, spoke as follows—I stop here long enough to say that certainly when I was a boy I did not know that I should ever be quoting Charles Sumner on anything; but I am going to quote him here. Here is what he had to say——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what was the date when Mr. Sumner said that, please?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the date here. I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Was it after the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the civil rights and other reconstruction measures in regard to the South?

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so. I shall let the Senator determine that question. Here is what Mr. Sumner said:

> I hold judges, and especially the Supreme Court of the country, in much respect—

As I think we all do—> but I am too familiar with the history of judicial proceedings to regard them with any superstitious reverence. Judges are but men, and in all ages have shown a fair share of frailty. Alas! alas! the worst crimes in history have been perpetrated under their sanction. The blood of martyrs and of patriots, crying from the ground, summons them to judgment.

Again Roscoe Conkling, long one of the most influential leaders of the Republican Party and for a long time a Member of the Senate, said:

> Why, sir, the infallibility ascribed to the Supreme Court makes the Constitution, the institutions of the country, nothing but wax in the hands of the judges!

Professor Russell, of the New York University Law School, said:

> The judiciary holds a higher rank in America than it does in England or anywhere else in the world. It also has a wider range of power. The deliberate setting aside of a statute by judicial authority for unconstitutionality is a practice wholly foreign to European ideas, and is recognized only in the United States.

Mr. President, I shall now come to what members of the Court themselves have said about the Court—not Senators, not Presidents, not doctors of law, not politicians, but what respected and learned members of the Court themselves have said.

Concerning the famous Income Tax case, to which I have already adverted, decided by a 5-to-4 opinion, after the somersault of Justice Shiras, Justice Harlan, of Kentucky, a splendid and able man and a great judge, had this to say:

> The practical effect of the decision today is to give to certain kinds of property a position of favoritism and advantage inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our social organization, and to invest them with power and influence that may be perilous to that portion of the American people upon whom rests the larger part of the burdens of government, and who ought not to be subjected to the dominion of aggregated wealth any more than the property of the country should be at the mercy of the lawless.

Mr. Justice Brown, another great member of the Court, was even more outspoken. He said:

> The decision involves nothing less than a surrender to the moneyed class. * * * I hope it may not prove the first step toward the submergence of the liberties of the people in a sordid despotism of wealth. As I cannot escape the conviction that the decision of the Court in this great case is fraught with immeasurable danger to the future of the country, and that it approaches the proportions of a national calamity, I feel it my duty to enter my protest against it.

Mr. Justice Harlan, whom I have already quoted, further said:

> When the American people come to the conclusion that the judiciary of this land is usurping to itself the functions of the legislative department of the Government and, by judicial construction only, is declaring what shall be the public policy of the United States, we shall find trouble.

There are today 130,000,000 people in the United States, but at that time Justice Harlan said:

> Ninety million of people—all sorts of people—are not going to submit to the usurpation by the judiciary of the functions of other departments of the Government on the power on its part to declare what is the policy of the United States.

Governor Baldwin, of Connecticut, former Chief Justice, said:

> This right of the Court to set itself up as the legislature is something no other country in the world would tolerate.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the proposal of President Roosevelt is sound and I intend to support it. Of course, the Judiciary Committee of the House and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate will first pass upon it, and no doubt will make changes. The House may make changes and the Senate may make changes, but in the end the proposal will be enacted into law. This country is not going to take any backward step. We are not going to be governed in the last analysis by Federal courts. We are not going to be governed by the issuance of injunctions by Federal courts. We are not going to be governed by decrees of the Supreme Court. Our Supreme Court is not so constituted as to render it either an efficient legislature or an efficient executive. Under the Constitution it has not equal power either with the Congress or with the Executive. That great instrument, to which I have always given my earnest adherence and always will, distinctly provides that the Congress has superior, wider, and more numerous powers than the Supreme Court. It also provides that the President of the United States has larger and fuller powers than the Supreme Court.

If Senators will look at that great instrument again, in the light of this statement, they will find that the actual powers vested in the two Houses of Congress are infinitely greater than those given to the Supreme Court of the United States. Look into that great instrument, and it will be found that the enormous powers given to the President of the United States, probably greater powers than are reposed in the sovereign of any other limited monarchy on earth today, are vastly greater and more numerous than the powers vested in the Supreme Court.

It was never intended that our Supreme Court should be equal in power to either of the other two branches of the Government. It has never been so and never will be so. Our Supreme Court, indeed, has greater powers than the supreme court of any other nation in the world, but under our system and under our Constitution its powers are far from equal to the powers of our Executive or the powers of our Congress.

Mr. President, President Roosevelt's Supreme Court proposal violates no provision of our Constitution. It adds nothing to the Constitution. It takes nothing from the Constitution. It simply exercises a jurisdiction and a right already given by the Constitution to the Congress and to the President, and a right heretofore exercised by Congress and the President.

Mr. President, a large majority on our Supreme Court has been intensely reactionary during all its history of 148 years. That majority has always taken the strictly legalistic view that the law is final. They have never taken the liberal view that the law grows. In President Wilson's last term several judges became eligible to retire, but they did not retire; apparently, they waited until a reactionary President, Mr. Harding, came in and he filled their places with reactionary appointees. In like manner, a number have been eligible for retirement during President Roosevelt's last 4 years, but none has retired; and the Court still remains as it has been all its history, but especially since 1869, about two-thirds reactionary. Could it be possible that reactionary members of the Court were thus attempting to pack the Court? Heaven forbid!

President Roosevelt's proposal, if adopted by the Congress, will give a liberal President the opportunity of appointing liberal judges on the bench. He ought to have that opportunity. In my judgment, it will not hurt the Court in the least but will greatly benefit the Court. Leave the Constitution as it is; but let us have a liberal majority of the Court which we hope will give to the greatest governmental instrument ever conceived by the genius of mortal men a construction justified by its terms, intended by its makers, in keeping with the ever-growing law, in harmony with our traditions, but at the same time consistent with the forward-looking policies which are the true causes of American greatness.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate today on the subject of unemployment and collective bargaining, collective bargaining being the safe and sane way to prevent industrial strife; and to urge the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to give immediate consideration to Senate Resolution 36, introduced by the able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], and reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

UNEMPLOYMENT

At the present time strikes arising over the principle of collective bargaining are causing a great loss of earnings to both labor and industry, and are retarding national recovery. Strikes are always imminent in periods of deflation and inflation. In 1921, following the deflationary post-war period, we faced strikes in a dozen or more industrial areas leading to the stoppage of work for over a million workers at one time. Today the situation is reversed, and we are on an upward swing. Nevertheless, the problem of strikes is a serious one.

I have always held with Lincoln that the workman has the right to quit his job. Any contrary opinion would be a reversion to slavery or economic serfdom under the strong hand of arbitrary power. But the right to strike and expediency are two quite different matters. Moreover, we must inquire more intelligently into the forces back of large-scale strikes. Especially we must give thought to the findings which are now being brought to light by the Senate Committee on Civil Liberties.

The public mutely suffers through all the turmoil of industrial warfare without sufficient understanding of where the trouble lies. The public wants disarmament and peace in industry as ardently as it wants reduction of waste in men and money in international conflicts, but, as yet, has found no effective way in which to approach either problem. What is now needed is a more serious study of the road to economic peace through increased employment.

Every strike or lock-out causing stoppage of production, with consequent increases in the cost of the product for consumption, hits the pocketbook of the buying public. No strike or lock-out ever wins a real victory. This is as true of a sit-down strike as of any other kind. Each strike ends in a tacit truce. Whichever party loses generally prepares at once for a future battle and hopes for a more successful issue at some later time. The consequences of such procedure for the Nation's industry are found in the poisonous fruits of suspicion, hostility, and industrial friction. Discontented workers are the inevitable product of these endless conflicts, and the discontented worker is always half-hearted and subefficient.

These clashes between men and groups of men will be inevitable so long as men remain what they are and human society is as we find it. The lion and the lamb may not lie down together in industry, in this generation or the next. I doubt if we want them to. A society without differences in opinion and clashings of interest would be completely lifeless. But it is absurd to think of battle as the one means of settlement of differences of opinion; and strikes are costly, far beyond our ability to calculate.

Strikes over the principle of collective bargaining will cause national difficulty until both labor and industry come to a general acceptance of this peaceful method of settling their disputes. Any delay in accepting this peaceful instrument will bring grief and loss to all of us.

The right of workers to organize must be maintained. The selection of one form of labor organization rather than another is really not primarily a matter which industry should decide, because choices in these issues belong to labor. Labor has never attempted to dictate the forms of organization with which it must bargain. The workers should be given the liberty of self-organization in any form which seems to offer them the most advantages. This is the sum and substance of economic democracy. There are really no issues so fundamental to human happiness in this country as the right of workers to organize through their free choice of their own representatives, and the maintenance of the American standard of living through tariff protection and selective immigration.

One of the urgent reasons which induced me to vote for the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was declared unconstitutional, was its section 7a; namely, that > Employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Under the National Industrial Recovery Act a great stimulus was given to the organization of trade associations, groups of employers, and employers' associations of all kinds. Employers and industries were thus enabled to do under that act what they were formerly not able to do, because through its provisions the antitrust laws were temporarily lifted.

If the Government is to encourage organization upon the part of employers, it seems logical for the Government to give the workers the necessary degree of protection in the formation of their own voluntary forms of organization. I do not propose that the Government shall become a party to the formation of labor organizations, but that it shall protect the workers in such organizational measures as free men are entitled to take.

The worker knows for himself that the struggle for the necessities of life is the greatest contest waged by man. Each man has his own way of fighting this battle. On the same wage, in the same town, in the same factory, and under the same conditions, one worker will live better, have more, save more, and push farther than a fellow worker. Slowly the less adapted fall back, and some of them drop out of the fight altogether. Often sickness, accidents, or some other adversity beyond human foresight and control are the reasons for these unhappy failures. Or it may be that the cause of failure is drunkeness, a want of capacity, or a refusal to work up to capacity. But however explained, there will always be some workers at least who cannot keep up to the standard set by others. This is one of the great problems of the industrial world. How can a system be devised which will enable all men to use their abilities so as to gain for themselves the just returns of their efforts and at the same time be prevented from taking from those less able the very support of life? In other words, how can we provide competition which is not only fair and just but at the same time is sufficiently generous to enable less fortunate workingmen an opportunity to carry on?

One of the reasons back of strikes is an excess of labor. This leads to a consideration of the greatest issue of our day—the problem of unemployment. We must now inquire into this situation if we are to preserve industrial peace. It will not be enough to take a census of the unemployed. A study of growing employment opportunities by localities, industries, and seasonal fluctuation is also needed, pointing the way to new outlets for labor. Such reports as are now available are insufficient to serve as a basis for constructive planning. The whole field of employment and unemployment must now be surveyed.

Surface indications on every hand show that even during the depression years employment did not lag to an appreciable extent commensurate with the degree of unemployment. Employment was fairly constant in many industries and localities, but not sufficiently so as to justify a hasty generalization for all industry. Unemployment was not diminished simply by filling old jobs, for after former employment had been restored to a large extent, following the worst of the depression extremes, unemployment persisted to an alarming degree.

The moral costs of unemployment are indeed grave. These are set forth in vivid fashion by the Welfare Council of New York City following a survey by questionnaire of about a thousand social workers there. I ask that an article appearing in Commerce and Finance of April 6, 1932, giving the result of a survey conducted by William Hodson, be printed at this point in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Commerce and Finance, for Apr. 6, 1932]

THE MORAL COSTS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

After a survey by questionnaire of about a thousand social workers in New York City's established public and private relief agencies, the Welfare Council on March 30 set forth a list of the serious psychological effects of the privations and hardships resulting from unemployment. The result of the survey, which has been in progress for several months, was announced by William Hodson, executive director of the council. The effects were listed as follows:

Discouragement, depression, desperation—often to the verge, and sometimes to the point, of actual crime.

Bewilderment and mental confusion.

Loss of self-confidence, development of a sense of failure and inferiority, or a thwarted feeling of helplessness.

Loss of initiative and sense of responsibility, indifference, indolence, apathy, and lethargy.

Passive submission and endurance, loss of courage to go on looking for work or to try anything new; or Obsession with the necessity of finding work, inability to take interest in other activities or to meet obligations.

Occasionally a sense of importance, as part of a front-page problem, enjoyment of the situation and of the attention it brings.

Bitterness, disrespect for law and religion, moral and spiritual deterioration.

Cynicism, resentment, antagonism, rebellion—against the wealthy, against society, against the Government.

Loss of pride and self-respect, carelessness about personal appearance, sensitiveness, avoidance of social contacts; or, on the contrary—

Restlessness, craving for excitement and distraction, leading to drinking and gambling.

Mental and nervous disturbances from irritability and excessive worry up to serious neurological conditions.

Contented acceptance of lower standards and dependence upon charity.

Constant fear, even when again employed, and a sense of insecurity; desire to give up well-paid, skilled seasonal work for city employment or anything that would insure a steady income, however low.

And yet we marvel at crime!

Mr. Hodson coupled his report with a repeated demand for additional city appropriations for relief and an appeal for support of the current "block-aid" campaign to raise funds for 20,000 unemployed heads of families during the spring. This campaign is said to be making good progress, the 43,000 workers in this field having turned in 78,000 donations by April 1. As the standard donations are 10, 25, 50 cents, and $1 a week for 20 weeks, the sums thus raised seem not to be very impressive.

The coal-mining industry celebrated All Fools' Day with widespread strikes, lock-outs, violence, and wage disagreements. While the 13,000 workers in the anthracite industry in Pennsylvania field were ordered by their own officials to go back to work, 75,000 involved in the coal fields of Illinois, Ohio, West Virginia, and Kentucky were thrown out of work by strikes and shut-downs. In Kentucky considerable sabotage in the mines was reported.

New York City Suburban Transit Engineering Board reports a decrease of 8.63 percent in the number of commuters entering and leaving the city during 1931, as compared with 1930; which seems to indicate that nearly every eleventh commuter is out of a job.

Police Commissioner Mulrooney, of New York City, in an address to the Bond Club, stated last week that the real cure for crime is to look after the delinquent youth of the Nation, providing for them healthful recreation and employment. Good advice; but how is a nation which is unable to provide employment for its youth who are not delinquent going to do it?

Mr. DAVIS. The prospect of continuing unemployment for large numbers of persons unless new avenues of work are found is convincingly shown in a number of important articles which I have in hand, and which I ask to be incorporated in my remarks. These are a statement in the United States News, October 1, 1934, an editorial in the United Mine Workers Journal, April 1, 1926, and a statement made by William G. Conley, formerly Governor of West Virginia, set forth in the United States Daily, November 2, 1929.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS UNEMPLOYMENT PERMANENT?—THREE MILLION WOULD BE IDLE EVEN IF 1929 BUSINESS PREVAILED—PROBLEM NOW IS WHAT TO DO WITH THESE IDLE BUT WILLING PERSONS

How permanent is the unemployment problem? How many of the 10,793,000 workers now living in enforced leisure or working at temporary jobs provided by Government funds are square pegs in round holes forever displaced from the jobs to which they devoted years of their lives and for which they were trained?

If by the wave of a magic wand America could go back to the unemployment levels of 1929; if today there were just as many workers in the factories, just as many clerks in the stores, the same number of farmers and if every other type of productive activity were on the level of the last year of prosperity there still would be 3,000,000 persons qualified to hold jobs who would be unable to obtain them.

FEWER WORKERS NEEDED

This figure is a conservative estimate of the number of persons who are permanently outside of industry. It is considered extremely doubtful if business, even at the levels of prosperity, would reemploy all of an additional 4,000,000 workers in the mining, manufacturing, and service industries in 1927, who are still out of jobs. New mechanical improvements have eliminated the need for many thousands of employees.

The estimate of the number of workers permanently displaced from industry is that of Isador Lubin, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Although it is based on May figures, it still holds good, for there has been only a slight change in employment since then.

TEN MILLION PAUPERS

While there is no official ratio, statisticians generally assume that there are two and one-half persons dependent on each worker. If this ratio is applicable to the 3,000,000 workers who are permanently displaced from employment, they have 7,500,000 dependents, making a total of 10,500,000 persons who are on a permanent pauper list in this country, unless some action is taken to open up new fields of employment.

After surveying the possible fields for the employment of these workers, Dr. Lubin comes to the conclusion they must be given jobs by the development of social services to fill the need for better health, educational, and recreational facilities. He says:

"With a modernized system of education and with recreational facilities adequate to our needs, and with a public-health system which will maintain the American people in keeping with modern scientific knowledge, there will be no difficulty in reabsorbing those who cannot during this generation find employment in private industry."

ONE WAY OF DOING IT

Activities of this type, in Dr. Lubin's opinion, must be financed by the Federal Government, for they do "not lend themselves to a regime of private profit." "To raise the necessary money," continues Dr. Lubin, "an increasing income will have to be taken from the profits of industry and through inheritance taxes." An example of a new type of enterprise outside the ordinary bounds of industry which is cited by Dr. Lubin is the Civilian Conservation Corps.

By a monthly expenditure which during July amounted to $35,000,000, the C. C. C. gave work to 350,000 men. Since July the total employment in C. C. C. camps has risen to 400,000. If, as is claimed by Government officials, each worker in the C. C. C. camps supports 3 persons, a permanent C. C. C. would care for 1,600,000 of the 10,500,000 who no longer are supported by industry, even under 1929 employment levels.

Two alternatives to Dr. Lubin's program are suggested. One of them, the curbing of the use of machinery, has been somewhat in evidence in some of the work-relief activities. The other alternative is further spreading of the available employment by shortening of work hours.

Objections are raised to both of these methods of increasing the number of jobs on the ground that they tend to lower living standards.

No action has been taken by the Federal Government to find a solution to the problem of employing the workers who are no longer needed by private industry. A research study, however, which ultimately may aid in the problem has been started in the United States Employment Service.

It is the conclusion of relief officials that the unemployed with whom the Government will have to deal if it undertakes a reemployment plan of the type suggested by Dr. Lubin are comparable in ability to the employed part of the population. This was not true during the years from 1929 to 1931, when there was a noticeably large proportion of inefficient workers among the unemployed.

THEIR EXPERIENCE

Partial returns from a study which the Federal Emergency Relief Administration is making to determine the work experience of those on relief show that two-fifths of the formerly employed persons who are now on relief worked at one job for more than 5 years. A similar number of those on relief who were formerly employed worked at one job for periods varying from 6 months to 5 years.

Reabsorption of workers into industry has gone on most rapidly in manufacturing industries which produce consumers' goods.

Since March 1933, 850,000 workers have gone back to their jobs in factories making clothing, food products, boots and shoes, and other goods in common use. Today these factories are employing only about 400,000 fewer persons than in 1929.

HEAVY INDUSTRIES

Durable-goods industries or the factories engaged in making iron and steel products, tools, lighting equipment, cement, and other materials needed for construction or for manufacture of goods in consumers' goods industries have reemployed about 1,000,000 workers, but still have about 1,500,000 fewer employees than in 1929.

Unemployment not accounted for in the manufacturing, mining, and service industries may be found among the workmen formerly employed in building construction, on the farms, and in the professional and domestic services. In addition to these there are the unemployed among the tenant farmers who have been displaced from farms because of crop-reduction plans and the 500,000 small-business men who have had to close their establishments.

In his survey to determine possibilities of reemployment Dr. Lubin concludes that there is small chance of the construction industry reemploying 1,500,000 workers and returning to 1929 levels without further stimulus from the Federal Government. And there is little chance for additional agricultural employment unless there should be a substantial rise in exports of agricultural products.

AN OLD PROBLEM

"Without a marked shift in our living habits", says Dr. Lubin, "the absorption of persons in domestic service will be limited."

The problem of reabsorbing displaced industrial workers into other fields is of long standing. That it grew at a rapid rate in the years after 1925 is shown by a report made in 1928 by the then Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. He estimated that between 1925 and January 1928 there was a shrinkage of 1,874,050 in the number of employed wage and salary workers.

One half of this shrinkage was attributed by the Commissioner to the introduction of new machines and mechanical devices into industry.

A GLOOMY PROSPECT

The relief outlook for this winter is even gloomier than for last year. There are now 17,000,000 persons on relief, and, according to Donald Richberg's report on unemployment it is probable that the number will reach 20,000,000 this winter.

During the last 3 years the attitude of the United States toward relief has changed. From a local problem handled by the local authorities it has become a national affair, under the direction of the Federal Government.

In the same way, the attitude toward unemployment is changing. Officials who are directly concerned with the problem are of the opinion that the permanent nature of the unemployment is being realized. Some provision must be made for smoothing the 3,000,000 or more square pegs—those persons who are permanently displaced from industry—so that they once more can fit into the national picture.

TWENTY PERCENT OF MEN ALWAYS IDLE AS RESULT OF WASTE IN INDUSTRY

NEW YORK.—Twenty percent of the manpower of the Nation is totally wasted and in some industries, such as coal, the waste amounts almost to chaos, sharply challenging the ingenuity of statesmen and engineers, according to speakers who discussed the social results of preventable industrial wastes at the nineteenth annual meeting of the American Association for Labor Legislation here.

Addresses were made by Walton H. Hamilton, of the Robert Brookings School of Economics and Government, Washington, D. C.; Stuart Chase, of the Labor Bureau, New York City.

"We see on any given working day seven or eight million adults doing precisely nothing", Mr. Chase declared. "Yet with the business cycle controlled, seasonal operations and turn-over less modified, safety measures and preventive measures installed, and social pressure exerted on the willfully idle, a large fraction of this loss is probably preventable."

The great majority are idle against their will and inclination, according to Mr. Chase. These are mainly the victims of seasonal and cyclical unemployment and preventable accidents and ill health.

If to the men who are idle through no fault of their own are added those who are idle by choice and those who are engaged in needless or socially harmful production, the result is, according to Mr. Chase, that "at least half the manpower of America counts for nothing."

"Functionalism", which Mr. Chase defined as "an economic system which has grown self-conscious with tangible goals measurable in human well-being", is, he said, "already at work", and is shown, for example, in the dawning realization of labor that productivity must be correlated to standard of living and in the whole engineering approach to waste elimination.

Mr. Hamilton declared that "wanton wastes" in the bituminous coal industry have produced chaos not only in production but in employment.

"There has been a failure in supply", he said, "three times in a 10-year period, and as yet no adequate steps have been taken to insure regular production of the stuff of power on which our whole industrial system depends.

"The workers have even more reason to be dissatisfied with the results of the competitive regime in the coal industry. Mining is today among the most hazardous of occupations in the country. The industry's failure to provide regular employment is all too clear. In the 10 years from 1910 to 1921 the working time of the miners averaged only 214 days a year.

"The source of the disorder, which is coal", he continued, "is the inability of free competition to control mine capacity."

In a discussion of the addresses, Gorton James, of the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, said that "the engineering profession is doing wonders in its attack on mechanical wastes." "But", he continued, "our methods of production may be producing wastes which are not visible or measurable and which for that reason are more insidious and dangerous. The fact that workers go home tired from work does not prove that we have used their efforts efficiently. There is a vast human waste of unnecessary fatigue and unrealized ambitions. This human waste is new, a product of the machine age."

AGE BARRIERS FOR WORKERS CREATE SOCIAL BURDEN—IDLENESS OF MEN AND WOMEN IN PRIME OF LIFE THROUGH DENIAL OF EMPLOYMENT IS ECONOMIC WASTE, SAYS GOVERNOR OF WEST VIRGINIA

By William G. Conley, Governor, State of West Virginia

Today we are face to face with a movement that may culminate in an unemployment situation far more serious than any we have experienced heretofore. For many years employers of labor, whether for executive, clerical, or manual work, have refused to employ men and women over 40 years of age, regardless of the experience those men and women might have had, regardless of their ability, regardless of their physical capacity, regardless of competency, efficiency, thrift, honesty, industry, and loyalty.

The mere fact that these men and women have lived 40 years is sufficient to raise the barrier against them and force them into the ranks of the idle. I am told that in some lines the age limit has been reduced to 35 years, and in a few instances to 30 years. If this tendency to disbar workers from employment simply because they have reached the age of 30, 35, or 40 years continues, without taking into consideration their capacity to serve, it is inevitable that our social and economic structure will be critically disturbed.

We are struggling now under a large burden caused by the disemployment of men and women who have reached really old age, and who are neither physically nor mentally capable of further active service. Old-age pensions have gained great favor in recent years, and it may be that such a system of retirement will solve the problem for the older employees; but what are we to do with men and women in the very prime of life, who are refused an opportunity to earn their self-support and the support of their families because they have lived a little more than half of their allotted threescore years and ten?

I have received letters from numerous persons telling of their discharge because of being 40 years of age or over, and stating that they are competent, able, and willing to render good service and earn a respectable living for themselves and their families. This is a condition, and not a theory, that confronts us.

It is my belief that every competent middle-aged and old-aged man and woman should have the same opportunity and stand on an equal footing in the right to earn a living with the young man and woman. There should be no arbitrary old-age barrier.

Many large employers of labor are taking care of this situation by providing retirement funds for their faithful employees and by other means. I am told that a large manufacturing company has a veteran employees' association composed of over 3,000 men and women who have served the company for periods ranging from 20 to 40 years. The company is not a charitable institution. It is organized for profit, yet it continues to employ those older men and women because most of them are young in the spirit of interest in, and enthusiasm for, their work and are loyal to their employer, and because the company finds their services profitable.

As far as my knowledge goes, all great authorities claim a man is not at the zenith of his career until he reaches the age of 50.

The majority of our great bankers, industrialists, merchants, and statesmen are over that age. The average age of the first 30 Presidents of the United States was 54 years and 4 months at the time of inauguration. Undoubtedly there are sufficient energy and brains among the middle-aged to cope equally with the younger man in many positions, if given the opportunity. Then why should a man or woman of 40 years or over, who is in good health, good mental and physical condition, be deprived of a market for his services? This is the question I am asking all employers to consider carefully.

From the standpoint of the State, the creation of an arbitrary artificial low age barrier affords a serious social problem, and one that is totally unnecessary. From the standpoint of the employer, the creation of an artificial low age barrier necessarily results in an enormous economic waste and must, eventually, bring about additional tax burdens, which are now too great.

The employer who deliberately closes his eyes to the economic and social dangers of this tendency of creating an arbitrary low-age barrier to employment invites trouble. It is far better that men and women earn a livelihood than become a charge on the community. Men and women must be supported somehow. The creation of such a social burden is unnecessary, uneconomic, and unwise.

Mr. DAVIS. Estimates now available and made public during the last few years vary greatly as to the extent of unemployment. I submit a few of these and ask that they be included in my remarks, because they show the nature of this problem.

They are as follows:

(1) Receding Unemployment, Conference Board Bulletin, National Industrial Conference Board, June 10, 1934.

(2) Three Unemployment Estimates, Conference Board Bulletin, December 10, 1934.

(3) Five Years of Unemployment, Conference Board Bulletin, March 10, 1935.

(5) Employment Survey, the New York Sun, May 23, 1936.

(6) Employment Survey, American Federation of Labor, May 1936.

(7) Editorial on Unemployment, the United States News, December 28, 1936.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Conference Board Bulletin of June 10, 1934]

RECEDING UNEMPLOYMENT

Just as the increase in the number of the unemployed was used as a significant measure of the progress of depression, so in recent months the increase in employment, and the consequent reduction in the number of the unemployed, has been heralded as the forerunner of a more complete recovery.

The recession of business activity soon after the stock-market crash of October 1929 brought unemployment on a large scale in its train. As early as April 1, 1930, the unemployed, according to the records of the census of population, already exceeded 3,000,000 persons. As time progressed this number increased until it reached a maximum of over 13,000,000 in March 1933. Fortunately a turn came at that time—employment increased and unemployment receded, with the result that probably 5,000,000 more were at work in April 1934 than in March 1933.

UNEMPLOYMENT ESTIMATES

During this entire period little direct information has been available, except in a few isolated localities, regarding the number of unemployed persons. The figures commonly cited rest largely on estimates, including the estimate by the Department of Commerce for January 1931, based on a special census in certain cities. From time to time the National Industrial Conference Board has made estimates of the number of unemployed persons in the United States. The total unemployed so computed and some of the elements which enter into the estimate are shown in the accompanying table and the diagram based upon it.

In common with other widely quoted estimates those of the Conference Board rest on the enumeration of the Bureau of the Census, April 1, 1930, and the more or less reliable indications of what has happened since that time. The census enumeration of population gave a record of all persons claiming gainful occupations who were not at work in their occupations on the census day. From these figures the number of the employed is determined, and various indications of changes in employment are then used to estimate the amount of employment and conversely of unemployment at later dates. The monthly indexes of employment in manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries compiled by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics are the principal sources of information regarding employment changes, and this information can be supplemented in a number of occupations by reliable data from other authoritative official and private sources. But when this material is exhausted there remain broad fields of occupation for which data are entirely lacking or so scanty as to make "estimates" based upon them approach mere "guesses."

[1] Includes a certain number of persons, representing 1.5 percent of the gainful workers in 1930, and a similar proportion at later dates, whose status as employed or not employed has not been determined.

The problems involved in unemployment estimates and the conservative course followed by the conference board can best be seen in an account of the procedure adopted by the board in making its estimates. Three points may be considered: (1) The initial figure of the number employed and unemployed in April 1930; (2) the subsequent changes in employment, from the combinations of which the increase in the number of the unemployed gainful workers over those recorded in 1930 is determined; and finally (3) an allowance for those of the new recruits to the normal army of gainful workers who had not found jobs.

INITIAL UNEMPLOYMENT, APRIL 1, 1930

The Bureau of the Census refrained from defining the term "unemployed" but the enumerators were instructed to ask each person reporting a gainful occupation whether or not he, or she, was at work on the preceding day. The returns were classified as follows:

Class A, persons out of a job, able to work, and looking for a job	2,429,062
Class B, persons having jobs but on lay-off without pay, excluding those sick or voluntarily idle	758,585
Class C, persons out of a job and unable to work	172,661
Class D, persons having jobs but idle on account of sickness or disability	273,588
Class E, persons out of a job and not looking for work	87,988
Class F, persons having jobs but voluntarily idle, without pay	84,595
Class G, persons having jobs and drawing pay, though not at work (on vacation, etc.)	82,335
Total gainful workers not at work	3,888,814

In this list the most numerous classes, A and B, obviously belonged among the unemployed, whatever definition might be adopted. There remained about 700,000 in the other classes, some of whom, though not working, had jobs and were to be reckoned among the employed. In order to follow a conservative course, and preferring to estimate too few rather than too many unemployed, the conference board considered only the classes A and B as unemployed, and computed in each field the number of gainful workers reported less these two classes as the number on the pay roll in April 1930. When the first estimate was made for a date later than April 1930, using preliminary census figures, no other course was possible, as details regarding classes A and B only, but not classes C to G, were available by industrial classes. The subsequent publication of these details did not, it was felt, require a reopening of the question. A division of the 700,000 gainful workers into two groups, unemployed and employed, even if there were positive indications where the line of division was to be drawn, would not have materially enhanced the accuracy of the estimates, into which of necessity many conjectural elements had to enter. The starting point of the board's estimate is that in all fields of gainful occupations 45,645,000 persons were on the pay roll in April 1930.

EMPLOYMENT CHANGES

This total was broken down into a large number of industrial groups for the purpose of computing subsequent changes in employment and conversely in unemployment. In some of these fields there were satisfactory indications of employment changes, in others none. The board has been able to find no satisfactory basis on which to estimate changes from month to month in employment in agriculture, forestry, and fishing, public service and professional service. In the absence of such information it has been unwilling to venture any necessarily arbitrary estimates for these fields of occupation. The unemployment for these fields, which represent approximately one-third of all occupations, has, therefore, been carried as a constant, namely, that recorded by the census for April 1, 1930.

[From the Conference Board Bulletin of Dec. 10, 1934]

THREE UNEMPLOYMENT ESTIMATES

In addition to the estimate by the National Industrial Conference Board, described in the November issue of the Bulletin, there are two widely cited estimates of unemployment in the United States, one prepared by the American Federation of Labor and the other by the Cleveland Trust Co.

The basic material used in the construction of the indexes is in large measure identical for the three computations. This material consists of (1) the results of the special inquiry relating to unemployment made in connection with the returns for occupations in the census enumeration of 1930 and (2) the indexes of employment in manufacturing and other industries compiled by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. Since the three estimates are based largely upon the same material, they are substantially similar in their results, as shown in figure 1. (Omitted from the RECORD.)

This similarity is more noticeable for the trend of unemployment than for its amount at any given time. The general picture of the movement of unemployment is the same, though its level is not identical in all the estimates. These differences arise from the fact that the basic materials for the computation, though abundant, are far from complete. They must at various points be supplemented by the judgment of the estimator. It is natural that differences of practice should arise, for example, regarding what classes, for whom no direct information is available, should be assumed to remain constant in employment and what classes should be assumed to vary in employment in the same degree as the immediate group to which they belong or as all definitely ascertained groups. Again, all estimates recognize that the ranks of the unemployed have been augmented by the contingent of new workers produced by the growth of population in excess of those who have dropped out of the competition for jobs by reason of death or infirmity. Methods of allowing for these new workers may differ. In short, it is differences, not in basic facts, but in the interpretation of those facts that determine the different levels that appear in the several estimates of unemployment.

All these estimates are built up on the basis of information, and sometimes by conjecture, regarding individual industries and branches of industry. The National Industrial Conference Board and the American Federation of Labor have from time to time published data regarding the extent of unemployment for certain industrial groups. But particular interest attaches to the findings of the Cleveland Trust Co. which distinguish the amount of unemployment in construction, in other durable-goods industries, in consumption-goods industries, and in activities that provide services. These distinctions are shown in figure 2. (Omitted from the RECORD.)

The division of the workers into the classes shown in the diagram was made on the basis of a careful analysis of the distribution of occupations in 1930. For subsequent periods estimates are based upon the indexes of employment and a distribution, necessarily hypothetical, of the new workers to the several classes.

The diagram shows the large number of unemployed in the construction- and durable-goods industries in contrast, for example, with consumption-goods industries, but does not bring out the relation of the unemployed to the total number of gainfully occupied in these industries. Through the courtesy of Col. Leonard P. Ayres, of the Cleveland Trust Co., we are permitted to publish the figures in the accompanying table showing for significant dates the proportion that the unemployed bear to the total number of persons, both employed and unemployed, credited to the industry.

The table indicates that when unemployment was at its maximum, in the early months of 1933, about 30 percent of all gainful workers were out of work. In the industries producing durable goods other than construction the proportion rose to double this figure, and was even greater in the construction industry. While in industries furnishing services the proportion of the unemployed approached the average of all gainful workers, it fell in industries producing consumption goods to about half the general average.

Since that period there has been considerable improvement, but over two-fifths of the workers in the durable-goods industries were still out of work in August 1934, while the proportion in the consumption-goods industries was less than one-tenth.

FIVE YEARS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The total number of unemployed workers in January 1935 was 10,142,000, according to the latest estimate made by the National Industrial Conference Board. From time to time the board has attempted to calculate the amount of unemployment in the United States, and in table 1 are presented revised estimates by months, covering the entire period from April 1930 to January 1935.

Since 1930 available information concerning unemployment in various fields of activity has improved in quality and has been greatly extended; hence, it has been necessary in many cases to revise the figures for the earlier dates. In the figures now presented, for example, the board has availed itself of the various revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in indexes of employment previously issued. In making its estimates the conference board takes into account three factors: (1) The 3,188,000 persons unemployed, able and willing to work, enumerated in the April 1930, census; [1] (2) the net decline in employees on pay rolls since that time; and (3) the estimated net increase in workers available for employment since the census date.

In reviewing the entire record of unemployment as it is presented in table 1, it must be remembered that it was preceded by the boom which ended in 1929. Except for about a million workers in transition between jobs, or sick, disabled, or voluntarily idle, employment was practically universal during that year.

[1] Census of Unemployment.
[2] Revised.
[3] This group includes agriculture, forestry and fishing, public service, and professional service. The numbers given are the unemployed in 1930, satisfactory data being unavailable from which later changes in unemployment can be computed.

The collapse of the stock market in October 1929 was the first major sign of the depression, and by April 1930, when the census of unemployment was taken, the reported unemployed numbered 3,187,647. These unemployed formed 6.5 percent of the total

[1] Reported by the census as class A, persons out of a job, able to work and looking for a job; and class B, persons having jobs but on lay-off without pay, excluding those sick or voluntarily idle.

The majority of our great bankers, industrialists, merchants, and statesmen are over that age. The average age of the first 30 Presidents of the United States was 54 years and 4 months at the time of inauguration. Undoubtedly there are sufficient energy and brains among the middle-aged to cope equally with the younger man in many positions, if given the opportunity. Then why should a man or woman of 40 years or over, who is in good health, good mental and physical condition, be deprived of a market for his services? This is the question I am asking all employers to consider carefully.

From the standpoint of the State, the creation of an arbitrary artificial low age barrier affords a serious social problem, and one that is totally unnecessary. From the standpoint of the employer, the creation of an artificial low age barrier necessarily results in an enormous economic waste and must, eventually, bring about additional tax burdens, which are now too great.

The employer who deliberately closes his eyes to the economic and social dangers of this tendency of creating an arbitrary low-age barrier to employment invites trouble. It is far better that men and women earn a livelihood than become a charge on the community. Men and women must be supported somehow. The creation of such a social burden is unnecessary, uneconomic, and unwise.

Mr. DAVIS. Estimates now available and made public during the last few years vary greatly as to the extent of unemployment. I submit a few of these and ask that they be included in my remarks, because they show the nature of this problem.

RECEDING UNEMPLOYMENT

Just as the increase in the number of the unemployed was used as a significant measure of the progress of depression, so in recent months the increase in employment, and the consequent reduction in the number of the unemployed, has been heralded as the forerunner of a more complete recovery.

The recession of business activity soon after the stock-market crash of October 1929 brought unemployment on a large scale in its train. As early as April 1, 1930, the unemployed, according to the records of the census of population, already exceeded 3,000,000 persons. As time progressed this number increased until it reached a maximum of over 13,000,000 in March 1933. Fortunately a turn came at that time—employment increased and unemployment receded, with the result that probably 5,000,000 more were at work in April 1934 than in March 1933.

UNEMPLOYMENT ESTIMATES

During this entire period little direct information has been available, except in a few isolated localities, regarding the number of unemployed persons. The figures commonly cited rest largely on estimates, including the estimate by the Department of Commerce for January 1931, based on a special census in certain cities. From time to time the National Industrial Conference Board has made estimates of the number of unemployed persons in the United States. The total unemployed so computed and some of the elements which enter into the estimate are shown in the accompanying table and the diagram based upon it.

In common with other widely quoted estimates those of the Conference Board rest on the enumeration of the Bureau of the Census, April 1, 1930, and the more or less reliable indications of what has happened since that time. The census enumeration of population gave a record of all persons claiming gainful occupations who were not at work in their occupations on the census day. From these figures the number of the employed is determined, and various indications of changes in employment are then used to estimate the amount of employment and conversely of unemployment at later dates. The monthly indexes of employment in manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries compiled by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics are the principal sources of information regarding employment changes, and this information can be supplemented in a number of occupations by reliable data from other authoritative official and private sources. But when this material is exhausted there remain broad fields of occupation for which data are entirely lacking or so scanty as to make "estimates" based upon them approach mere "guesses."

[1] Includes a certain number of persons, representing 1.5 percent of the gainful workers in 1930, and a similar proportion at later dates, whose status as employed or not employed has not been determined.

The problems involved in unemployment estimates and the conservative course followed by the conference board can best be seen in an account of the procedure adopted by the board in making its estimates. Three points may be considered: (1) The initial figure of the number employed and unemployed in April 1930; (2) the subsequent changes in employment, from the combinations of which the increase in the number of the unemployed gainful workers over those recorded in 1930 is determined; and finally (3) an allowance for those of the new recruits to the normal army of gainful workers who had not found jobs.

INITIAL UNEMPLOYMENT, APRIL 1, 1930

The Bureau of the Census refrained from defining the term "unemployed" but the enumerators were instructed to ask each person reporting a gainful occupation whether or not he, or she, was at work on the preceding day. The returns were classified as follows:

Class A, persons out of a job, able to work, and looking for a job	2,429,062
Class B, persons having jobs but on lay-off without pay, excluding those sick or voluntarily idle	758,585
Class C, persons out of a job and unable to work	172,661
Class D, persons having jobs but idle on account of sickness or disability	273,588
Class E, persons out of a job and not looking for work	87,988
Class F, persons having jobs but voluntarily idle, without pay	84,595
Class G, persons having jobs and drawing pay, though not at work (on vacation, etc.)	82,335
Total gainful workers not at work	3,888,814

In this list the most numerous classes, A and B, obviously belonged among the unemployed, whatever definition might be adopted. There remained about 700,000 in the other classes, some of whom, though not working, had jobs and were to be reckoned among the employed. In order to follow a conservative course, and preferring to estimate too few rather than too many unemployed, the conference board considered only the classes A and B as unemployed, and computed in each field the number of gainful workers reported less these two classes as the number on the pay roll in April 1930. When the first estimate was made for a date later than April 1930, using preliminary census figures, no other course was possible, as details regarding classes A and B only, but not classes C to G, were available by industrial classes. The subsequent publication of these details did not, it was felt, require a reopening of the question. A division of the 700,000 gainful workers into two groups, unemployed and employed, even if there were positive indications where the line of division was to be drawn, would not have materially enhanced the accuracy of the estimates, into which of necessity many conjectural elements had to enter. The starting point of the board's estimate is that in all fields of gainful occupations 45,645,000 persons were on the pay roll in April 1930.

EMPLOYMENT CHANGES

This total was broken down into a large number of industrial groups for the purpose of computing subsequent changes in employment and conversely in unemployment. In some of these fields there were satisfactory indications of employment changes, in others none. The board has been able to find no satisfactory basis on which to estimate changes from month to month in employment in agriculture, forestry, and fishing, public service and professional service. In the absence of such information it has been unwilling to venture any necessarily arbitrary estimates for these fields of occupation. The unemployment for these fields, which represent approximately one-third of all occupations, has, therefore, been carried as a constant, namely, that recorded by the census for April 1, 1930.

[From the Conference Board Bulletin of Dec. 10, 1934]

THREE UNEMPLOYMENT ESTIMATES

In addition to the estimate by the National Industrial Conference Board, described in the November issue of the Bulletin, there are two widely cited estimates of unemployment in the United States, one prepared by the American Federation of Labor and the other by the Cleveland Trust Co.

The basic material used in the construction of the indexes is in large measure identical for the three computations. This material consists of (1) the results of the special inquiry relating to unemployment made in connection with the returns for occupations in the census enumeration of 1930 and (2) the indexes of employment in manufacturing and other industries compiled by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. Since the three estimates are based largely upon the same material, they are substantially similar in their results, as shown in figure 1. (Omitted from the RECORD.)

This similarity is more noticeable for the trend of unemployment than for its amount at any given time. The general picture of the movement of unemployment is the same, though its level is not identical in all the estimates. These differences arise from the fact that the basic materials for the computation, though abundant, are far from complete. They must at various points be supplemented by the judgment of the estimator. It is natural that differences of practice should arise, for example, regarding what classes, for whom no direct information is available, should be assumed to remain constant in employment and what classes should be assumed to vary in employment in the same degree as the immediate group to which they belong or as all definitely ascertained groups. Again, all estimates recognize that the ranks of the unemployed have been augmented by the contingent of new workers produced by the growth of population in excess of those who have dropped out of the competition for jobs by reason of death or infirmity. Methods of allowing for these new workers may differ. In short, it is differences, not in basic facts, but in the interpretation of those facts that determine the different levels that appear in the several estimates of unemployment.

All these estimates are built up on the basis of information, and sometimes by conjecture, regarding individual industries and branches of industry. The National Industrial Conference Board and the American Federation of Labor have from time to time published data regarding the extent of unemployment for certain industrial groups. But particular interest attaches to the findings of the Cleveland Trust Co. which distinguish the amount of unemployment in construction, in other durable-goods industries, in consumption-goods industries, and in activities that provide services. These distinctions are shown in figure 2. (Omitted from the RECORD.)

The division of the workers into the classes shown in the diagram was made on the basis of a careful analysis of the distribution of occupations in 1930. For subsequent periods estimates are based upon the indexes of employment and a distribution, necessarily hypothetical, of the new workers to the several classes.

The diagram shows the large number of unemployed in the construction- and durable-goods industries in contrast, for example, with consumption-goods industries, but does not bring out the relation of the unemployed to the total number of gainfully occupied in these industries. Through the courtesy of Col. Leonard P. Ayres, of the Cleveland Trust Co., we are permitted to publish the figures in the accompanying table showing for significant dates the proportion that the unemployed bear to the total number of persons, both employed and unemployed, credited to the industry.

The table indicates that when unemployment was at its maximum, in the early months of 1933, about 30 percent of all gainful workers were out of work. In the industries producing durable goods other than construction the proportion rose to double this figure, and was even greater in the construction industry. Since that period there has been considerable improvement, but over two-fifths of the workers in the durable-goods industries were still out of work in August 1934, while the proportion in the consumption-goods industries was less than one-tenth.

[From the Conference Board Bulletin of Mar. 10, 1935]

FIVE YEARS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The total number of unemployed workers in January 1935 was 10,142,000, according to the latest estimate made by the National Industrial Conference Board. From time to time the board has attempted to calculate the amount of unemployment in the United States, and in table 1 are presented revised estimates by months, covering the entire period from April 1930 to January 1935.

Since 1930 available information concerning unemployment in various fields of activity has improved in quality and has been greatly extended; hence, it has been necessary in many cases to revise the figures for the earlier dates. In the figures now presented, for example, the board has availed itself of the various revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in indexes of employment previously issued. In making its estimates the conference board takes into account three factors: (1) The 3,183,000 persons unemployed, able and willing to work, enumerated in the April 1930, census; [1] (2) the net decline in employees on pay rolls since that time; and (3) the estimated net increase in workers available for employment since the census date.

In reviewing the entire record of unemployment as it is presented in table 1, it must be remembered that it was preceded by the boom which ended in 1929. Except for about a million workers in transition between jobs, or sick, disabled, or voluntarily idle, employment was practically universal during that year.

[1] Census of Unemployment.
[2] Revised.
[3] This group includes agriculture, forestry and fishing, public service, and professional service. The numbers given are the unemployed in 1930, satisfactory data being unavailable from which later changes in unemployment can be computed.

The collapse of the stock market in October 1929 was the first major sign of the depression, and by April 1930, when the census of unemployment was taken, the reported unemployed numbered 3,187,647. These unemployed formed 6.5 percent of the total number of 48,829,000 gainful workers in the United States. Subsequently, the Secretary of Commerce put the number of jobless at 6,050,000, based on a sample census in January 1931. In September of that year the National Industrial Conference Board made the then startling announcement that unemployment, according to its own conservative estimates, had passed the 7,000,000 mark in midsummer.

The peak of unemployment, according to the conference board's estimates, occurred in March 1933, at the time of the banking crisis, with a total of 13,300,000. From that high point, then, the board's present estimate shows a decline of 3,158,000, or 23.7 percent.

This latest estimate of unemployment indicates an increase in the number of unemployed over December 1934 of 402,000, or 4.1 percent, due mainly to the quieting down of business activity in the distribution field after the Christmas holiday season. This is shown in table 2. Further, unemployment in trade increased 408,000; in transportation, by 12,000; in mining, by 5,000; in miscellaneous industry, by 11,000. A decrease in unemployment, however, is shown in the increase of employment of 5,000 in manufacturing and mechanical industry and 55,000 in domestic and personal service.

Nevertheless, there was a slight improvement in the unemployment situation during 1934. Compared with January 1934, unemployment in January 1935 showed a decline of 11.6 percent in domestic and personal service, 10.8 percent in manufacturing and mechanical industries, 7.4 percent in trade, 6.6 percent in mining, and 4.1 percent in miscellaneous industries. In transportation, however, unemployment rose 1.1 percent during the year. In total unemployment the month of January 1935 shows a drop of 396,000, or 3.8 percent, from the same month last year.

Finally, while it is true that the number of unemployed in manufacturing and mechanical industries far exceeds that in any other division, the proportionate increase from April 1930 to January 1935 was greater in some other fields.

EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

YOUTH ON RELIEF [1]

Of approximately 18,067,000 persons on relief in the United States in May 1935, 2,876,800 or 15.9 percent were 16 to 24 years of age. Of these young people, 60 percent were classified as urban and 40 percent as rural. Approximately two-thirds of the 1,726,800 urban relief youth, both white and colored, were working or seeking employment in May 1935; 675,200 or nearly 80 percent of the males and 467,500 or 53.0 percent of the females fell in this class.

Urban young people on relief

From the following table it will be noted that of 1,142,700 urban young persons working or seeking employment in May 1935, more than three-quarters (876,000) had work experience. Of those who had such experience, 40.9 percent of the females and 38.4 percent of the males were unskilled workers. While 84.4 percent of the colored youth working or looking for jobs had worked before, the percentage of colored youth whose work experience was of the unskilled type was 68.0 as compared to 32.0 percent of the white youth in that class.

[1] The figures in this table are estimated from sample studies; therefore the numbers of less than 10,000, since they constitute only a fraction of 1 percent of the total, are subject to large margins of error.
[2] Fewer than 50 persons.

One-half of the 584,100 urban youth on general relief who were not at work or seeking employment were attending full-time school; the other half were not at work, nor looking for employment nor attending school full time. In the nonworking group, 89.7 percent of the males but only one-third of the females were reported as attending school at the date under review. The remainder of the girls and young women were, for the most part, in the age group 18–24, and were living at home, often caring for dependent children.

The urban people on relief in the age group 16–24 who were not working nor looking for work and were physically handicapped numbered 40,700, of whom seven-tenths were females.

Of the 1,726,800 urban youth on the relief rolls, 27.3 percent were married, and approximately 31.4 percent of those who were married were heads of families. The percentage of unmarried young persons in the urban relief group who were family heads was very small, but nearly all married male urban relief youths were family heads. Of 152,800 urban youth who were family heads, 97 percent were married, and an estimated 84 percent of this married group were employable.

Because of the difficulties in defining "unemployable", female heads of families were not tabulated separately as "employable" or "unemployable." It is probable that a great majority of the female family heads were not able to work, since a considerable number of them had the care of dependent children or other family responsibilities.

It is also estimated that of all urban relief youth, slightly over 45 percent had more than an eighth-grade education. Estimates for corresponding educational attainment by the following groups of the urban youth relief population are: White youth, 48.6 percent; colored youth, 30.2 percent; female youth, 48.7 percent; male youth, 41.6 percent.

Rural relief youth

In May 1935 a very large proportion (72 percent) of the 1,150,000 rural youth on general relief were residents of the open country. Females constituted a slightly larger percentage of the young people on rural relief than males. Approximately 10 percent of the total relief youth were household heads and 21 percent were attending full-time school. More than half (627,000) of the rural relief youth were working or seeking work, but 13 percent of the males in this group and 36 percent of the females had never been employed as long as 4 consecutive weeks in any occupation.

Unskilled labor was predominant in the occupational experience of the rural relief young people who had been employed. Of the total rural male relief youth who had work experience, 11 percent had been farm operators. The work experience of 18 percent of rural female youth on relief was in domestic and personal service.

Transient youth under care

Approximately 20 percent of 273,820 persons who were receiving assistance as transients in May 1935 were 16–24 years of age, while the percentage of youth in the relief population at that date was estimated as 15.9. Nearly nine-tenths of the 54,480 transient young persons under care were white and nearly three-fourths were males.

Almost all (94.4 percent) of the unattached transients in the 16–24 age group were single, and practically all the male heads of young transient family groups were married and living with their wives.

"Since the absence of a male head is implied in the classification of family groups with female heads, it is not surprising that three-fourths (74 percent) of these female heads are either single, divorced, widowed, or permanently separated.

"One of the numerically small but particularly serious problems of relief youth shows up in the female transient youth population. Of the unattached, as many as 15 percent are married, while 20.3 percent are widowed, divorced, or separated. And of the female family heads only 26.0 percent are married and living with their husbands; 20.8 percent are single; and the remainder, 53.2 percent, are widowed, divorced, or separated."

Only 61.3 percent of the youths receiving transient care reported a usual occupation and 76.7 percent of those thus reporting were semiskilled or unskilled workers.

A majority of the persons 16–24 years of age registering at the transient agencies had been wandering for less than 6 months but 17 percent of them had been on the road for 15 months or longer. The unattached youth and the youth in family groups had been transients for approximately the same length of time.

Slightly over one-half of the unattached transient youth had more than a grammar-school education but only 3 percent had progressed beyond the high-school level. Only 31 percent of the Negroes as against 54 percent of the whites had gone beyond grammar school.

Youth in Civilian Conservation Corps camp

At the time of the survey (May 1935) over a quarter of a million (270,500) male youth were in C. C. C. camps, of whom 92.7 percent were white.

THE TRANSIENT UNEMPLOYED

The only solution of the problem of depression transients is through an adjustment of this mobile labor supply to the requirements of those sections which need workers. Resettlement and stability, however, depend upon economic opportunity. Consequently "it seems highly probable that the dissolution of the transient population will proceed only as rapidly as business and industry can provide the employment essential to stability. To whatever extent this provision falls short the transient problem will remain unsolved." These are the conclusions reached in an analysis of the characteristics of jobless transients on relief recently issued by the Federal Works Progress Administration.[1]

Under the Federal Emergency Relief Act of May 1933 special provision was made for transients, defined as unattached persons or family groups that had not resided for 1 continuous year or longer in the boundaries of the State at the time of application for relief. It was this group that formed the subject of this special study. The analysis covers the movements of these wanderers, their reasons for migration, and the problems connected with their reabsorption into private industry.

In the fall and winter of 1930 reports from municipal lodgings, missions, and shelters in metropolitan districts indicated that as compared with preceding years the number of homeless men seeking aid was increasing at a rapid rate. At approximately the same period States in the South and West became anxious concerning the inflow of needy persons from other parts of the country.

As these migrants of the depression were almost constantly in motion, it was not possible to determine their number. According to estimates presented at congressional hearings on relief legislation, there were between one and one-half and five million. It was found, however, that such estimates greatly exceeded the number of persons cared for under the transient relief program. These overestimates resulted largely from the inclusion in the term "transient" of all homeless individuals, whether or not they had a legal residence, and also from estimating the total number of transients from observations in localities in which the number of transients was greatest.

Based on careful examination of registrations, the maximum of the transient relief population during the period in which the transient relief program was in operation is estimated as 200,000 unattached persons and 50,000 family groups. Because of the everchanging membership of this population it is considered likely, however, that the number of individuals and family groups aided by transient bureaus at some period was double or triple these estimates.

The personal and occupational characteristics of these depression migrants were ascertained by studying the monthly registrations in 13 representative cities. Among the significant findings in this connection are:

(1) About two-thirds of the unattached individuals and one-half of the family group heads were between the ages of 16 and 35 years.

(2) The unattached women did not exceed 3 percent of the transients in any month, but about 15 percent of the heads of family groups were women.

(3) Native white persons constituted the great majority of transients, Negroes representing only about one-tenth of the monthly registrations, and foreign-born whites only about one-twentieth. In the transient relief population the percentage of native white persons was greater, the percentage of foreign-born whites less, and the percentage of Negroes approximately the same as in the general population.

(4) Only 2 percent of the unattached transients and 3 percent of the heads of transient families had had no formal education. About two-thirds of both groups had a grade-school education or more.

(5) Approximately 95 percent of the unattached transients were reported as employable and as expressing willingness to work. A similar report was made for 90 percent of the heads of families.

(6) Broad classifications of ordinary occupations disclose that the percentage of unskilled and semiskilled workers in the transient relief population was greater than the percentage of such workers in the general population or in the resident relief population.

(7) The most common reason for the wandering of these depression migrants was unemployment. Other important reasons were ill health, the desire for adventure, domestic difficulties, and insufficient relief.

(8) The unattached transients in the relief population of the United States as a whole came for the most part from States to the east of the Mississippi River and transient families from States to the west of that river.

(9) According to registrations in 13 representative cities, about 80 percent of the unattached transients and 70 percent of transient family groups came from urban centers with a population of 2,500 or more. Transients from rural sections came more frequently from towns of less than 2,500 population than from the open country and farms.

(10) The heaviest and most constant net gains in population as a result of the migration of transients were reported by States in the western and southwestern parts of the country, while the heaviest and most constant net losses were reported by States in the eastern, southeastern, and west central regions.

The findings of the report indicate that transiency was due in large part to two circumstances; i. e., extensive unemployment and the mobility of the population. The problem of relief presented by transients was the outcome of another factor—legal settlement or residence as a prerequisite for public or private relief in any community.

"Except for the fact that they were nonresidents, there seems little reason for considering transients as a distinct and separate group in the total relief population. Although they could be distinguished from the resident unemployed, it was principally because they were younger, and included a greater proportion of unattached persons. Actually the transient population represented the more active and restless element among the great number of unemployed created by the depression. Migration offered an escape from inactivity; and in addition, there was the possibility that all communities were not equally affected by unemployment."

The movement of a substantial part of this transient relief population seems to have been wasted effort. Much of this migration was away from urban centers, which, from the viewpoint of economic progress, were probably more able to provide employment than were the localities to which the transients were attracted. Upon the recovery of business and industry "it may be expected that many of the depression migrants will return to areas similar to the ones they left."

INCREASE IN EMPLOYMENT AMONG LIBRARIANS IN 1935

In 1935 the number of unemployed librarians was less than in any year since 1931, according to a report in part I of the January 1936 issue of the Bulletin of the American Library Association. In November 1935, 34 library schools reported that 685 unemployed graduates who had had at least a full year of library science education were seeking positions. This number was about 33 percent below that reported in 1934 by 31 library schools and about 40 percent less than that reported in 1933 by 31 library schools. "In addition, a number equivalent to those graduating from library schools in the years 1934 and 1935, approximately 2,000 have also been placed."

Almost all of the library schools stated that the placement of 1935 graduates was more rapid than that of any classes since 1930.

Approximately one-third of the librarians who were not employed and were looking for positions at the time of the report completed their library course in 1932 or 1933, when there were almost no opportunities for employment in libraries.

number of 48,829,000 gainful workers in the United States. Subsequently, the Secretary of Commerce put the number of jobless at 6,050,000, based on a sample census in January 1931. In September of that year the National Industrial Conference Board made the then startling announcement that unemployment, according to its own conservative estimates, had passed the 7,000,000 mark in midsummer.

The peak of unemployment, according to the conference board's estimates, occurred in March 1933, at the time of the banking crisis, with a total of 13,300,000. From that high point, then, the board's present estimate shows a decline of 3,158,000, or 23.7 percent.

This latest estimate of unemployment indicates an increase in the number of unemployed over December 1934 of 402,000, or 4.1 percent, due mainly to the quieting down of business activity in the distribution field after the Christmas holiday season. This is shown in table 2. Further, unemployment in trade increased 408,000; in transportation, by 12,000; in mining, by 5,000; in miscellaneous industry, by 11,000. A decrease in unemployment, however, is shown in the increase of employment of 5,000 in manufacturing and mechanical industry and 55,000 in domestic and personal service.

Nevertheless, there was a slight improvement in the unemployment situation during 1934. Compared with January 1934, unemployment in January 1935 showed a decline of 11.6 percent in domestic and personal service, 10.8 percent in manufacturing and mechanical industries, 7.4 percent in trade, 6.6 percent in mining, and 4.1 percent in miscellaneous industries. In transportation, however, unemployment rose 1.1 percent during the year. In total unemployment the month of January 1935 shows a drop of 396,000, or 3.8 percent, from the same month last year.

Finally, while it is true that the number of unemployed in manufacturing and mechanical industries far exceeds that in any other division, the proportionate increase from April 1930 to January 1935 was greater in some other fields.

EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

YOUTH ON RELIEF [1]

Of approximately 18,067,000 persons on relief in the United States in May 1935, 2,876,800 or 15.9 percent were 16 to 24 years of age. Of these young people, 60 percent were classified as urban and 40 percent as rural. Approximately two-thirds of the 1,726,800 urban relief youth, both white and colored, were working or seeking employment in May 1935; 675,200 or nearly 80 percent of the males and 467,500 or 53.0 percent of the females fell in this class.

Urban young people on relief

From the following table it will be noted that of 1,142,700 urban young persons working or seeking employment in May 1935, more than three-quarters (876,000) had work experience. Of those who had such experience, 40.9 percent of the females and 38.4 percent of the males were unskilled workers. While 84.4 percent of the colored youth working or looking for jobs had worked before, the percentage of colored youth whose work experience was of the unskilled type was 68.0 as compared to 32.0 percent of the white youth in that class.

[1] The figures in this table are estimated from sample studies; therefore the numbers of less than 10,000, since they constitute only a fraction of 1 percent of the total, are subject to large margins of error.

[2] Fewer than 50 persons.

One-half of the 584,100 urban youth on general relief who were not at work or seeking employment were attending full-time school; the other half were not at work, nor looking for employment nor attending school full time. In the nonworking group, 89.7 percent of the males but only one-third of the females were reported as attending school at the date under review. The remainder of the girls and young women were, for the most part, in the age group 18–24, and were living at home, often caring for dependent children.

The urban people on relief in the age group 16–24 who were not working nor looking for work and were physically handicapped numbered 40,700, of whom seven-tenths were females.

Of the 1,726,800 urban youth on the relief rolls, 27.3 percent were married, and approximately 31.4 percent of those who were married were heads of families. The percentage of unmarried young persons in the urban relief group who were family heads was very small, but nearly all married male urban relief youths were family heads. Of 152,800 urban youth who were family heads, 97 percent were married, and an estimated 84 percent of this married group were employable.

Because of the difficulties in defining "unemployable", female heads of families were not tabulated separately as "employable" or "unemployable." It is probable that a great majority of the female family heads were not able to work, since a considerable number of them had the care of dependent children or other family responsibilities.

It is also estimated that of all urban relief youth, slightly over 45 percent had more than an eighth-grade education. Estimates for corresponding educational attainment by the following groups of the urban youth relief population are: White youth, 48.6 percent; colored youth, 30.2 percent; female youth, 48.7 percent; male youth, 41.6 percent.

Rural relief youth

In May 1935 a very large proportion (72 percent) of the 1,150,000 rural youth on general relief were residents of the open country. Females constituted a slightly larger percentage of the young people on rural relief than males. Approximately 10 percent of the total relief youth were household heads and 21 percent were attending full-time school. More than half (627,000) of the rural relief youth were working or seeking work, but 13 percent of the males in this group and 36 percent of the females had never been employed as long as 4 consecutive weeks in any occupation.

Unskilled labor was predominant in the occupational experience of the rural relief young people who had been employed. Of the total rural male relief youth who had work experience, 11 percent had been farm operators. The work experience of 18 percent of rural female youth on relief was in domestic and personal service.

Transient youth under care

Approximately 20 percent of 273,820 persons who were receiving assistance as transients in May 1935 were 16–24 years of age, while the percentage of youth in the relief population at that date was estimated as 15.9. Nearly nine-tenths of the 54,480 transient young persons under care were white and nearly three-fourths were males.

Almost all (94.4 percent) of the unattached transients in the 16–24 age group were single, and practically all the male heads of young transient family groups were married and living with their wives.

"Since the absence of a male head is implied in the classification of family groups with female heads, it is not surprising that three-fourths (74 percent) of these female heads are either single, divorced, widowed, or permanently separated.

"One of the numerically small but particularly serious problems of relief youth shows up in the female transient youth population. Of the unattached, as many as 15 percent are married, while 20.3 percent are widowed, divorced, or separated. And of the female family heads only 26.0 percent are married and living with their husbands; 20.8 percent are single; and the remainder, 53.2 percent, are widowed, divorced, or separated."

Only 61.3 percent of the youths receiving transient care reported a usual occupation and 76.7 percent of those thus reporting were semiskilled or unskilled workers.

A majority of the persons 16–24 years of age registering at the transient agencies had been wandering for less than 6 months but 17 percent of them had been on the road for 15 months or longer. The unattached youth and the youth in family groups had been transients for approximately the same length of time.

Slightly over one-half of the unattached transient youth had more than a grammar-school education but only 3 percent had progressed beyond the high-school level. Only 31 percent of the Negroes as against 54 percent of the whites had gone beyond grammar school.

Youth in Civilian Conservation Corps camp

At the time of the survey (May 1935) over a quarter of a million (270,500) male youth were in C. C. C. camps, of whom 92.7 percent were white.

THE TRANSIENT UNEMPLOYED

The only solution of the problem of depression transients is through an adjustment of this mobile labor supply to the requirements of those sections which need workers. Resettlement and stability, however, depend upon economic opportunity. Consequently "it seems highly probable that the dissolution of the transient population will proceed only as rapidly as business and industry can provide the employment essential to stability. To whatever extent this provision falls short the transient problem will remain unsolved." These are the conclusions reached in an analysis of the characteristics of jobless transients on relief recently issued by the Federal Works Progress Administration.[1]

Under the Federal Emergency Relief Act of May 1933 special provision was made for transients, defined as unattached persons or family groups that had not resided for 1 continuous year or longer in the boundaries of the State at the time of application for relief. It was this group that formed the subject of this special study. The analysis covers the movements of these wanderers, their reasons for migration, and the problems connected with their reabsorption into private industry.

In the fall and winter of 1930 reports from municipal lodgings, missions, and shelters in metropolitan districts indicated that as compared with preceding years the number of homeless men seeking aid was increasing at a rapid rate. At approximately the same period States in the South and West became anxious concerning the inflow of needy persons from other parts of the country.

As these migrants of the depression were almost constantly in motion, it was not possible to determine their number. According to estimates presented at congressional hearings on relief legislation, there were between one and one-half and five million. It was found, however, that such estimates greatly exceeded the number of persons cared for under the transient relief program. These overestimates resulted largely from the inclusion in the term "transient" of all homeless individuals, whether or not they had a legal residence, and also from estimating the total number of transients from observations in localities in which the number of transients was greatest.

Based on careful examination of registrations, the maximum of the transient relief population during the period in which the transient relief program was in operation is estimated as 200,000 unattached persons and 50,000 family groups. Because of the everchanging membership of this population it is considered likely, however, that the number of individuals and family groups aided by transient bureaus at some period was double or triple these estimates.

The personal and occupational characteristics of these depression migrants were ascertained by studying the monthly registrations in 13 representative cities. Among the significant findings in this connection are:

(1) About two-thirds of the unattached individuals and one-half of the family group heads were between the ages of 16 and 35 years.

(2) The unattached women did not exceed 3 percent of the transients in any month, but about 15 percent of the heads of family groups were women.

(3) Native white persons constituted the great majority of transients, Negroes representing only about one-tenth of the monthly registrations, and foreign-born whites only about one-twentieth. In the transient relief population the percentage of native white persons was greater, the percentage of foreign-born whites less, and the percentage of Negroes approximately the same as in the general population.

(4) Only 2 percent of the unattached transients and 3 percent of the heads of transient families had had no formal education. About two-thirds of both groups had a grade-school education or more.

(5) Approximately 95 percent of the unattached transients were reported as employable and as expressing willingness to work. A similar report was made for 90 percent of the heads of families.

(6) Broad classifications of ordinary occupations disclose that the percentage of unskilled and semiskilled workers in the transient relief population was greater than the percentage of such workers in the general population or in the resident relief population.

(7) The most common reason for the wandering of these depression migrants was unemployment. Other important reasons were ill health, the desire for adventure, domestic difficulties, and insufficient relief.

(8) The unattached transients in the relief population of the United States as a whole came for the most part from States to the east of the Mississippi River and transient families from States to the west of that river.

(9) According to registrations in 13 representative cities, about 80 percent of the unattached transients and 70 percent of transient family groups came from urban centers with a population of 2,500 or more. Transients from rural sections came more frequently from towns of less than 2,500 population than from the open country and farms.

(10) The heaviest and most constant net gains in population as a result of the migration of transients were reported by States in the western and southwestern parts of the country, while the heaviest and most constant net losses were reported by States in the eastern, southeastern, and west central regions.

The findings of the report indicate that transiency was due in large part to two circumstances; i. e., extensive unemployment and the mobility of the population. The problem of relief presented by transients was the outcome of another factor—legal settlement or residence as a prerequisite for public or private relief in any community.

"Except for the fact that they were nonresidents, there seems little reason for considering transients as a distinct and separate group in the total relief population. Although they could be distinguished from the resident unemployed, it was principally because they were younger, and included a greater proportion of unattached persons. Actually the transient population represented the more active and restless element among the great number of unemployed created by the depression. Migration offered an escape from inactivity; and in addition, there was the possibility that all communities were not equally affected by unemployment."

The movement of a substantial part of this transient relief population seems to have been wasted effort. Much of this migration was away from urban centers, which, from the viewpoint of economic progress, were probably more able to provide employment than were the localities to which the transients were attracted. Upon the recovery of business and industry "it may be expected that many of the depression migrants will return to areas similar to the ones they left."

INCREASE IN EMPLOYMENT AMONG LIBRARIANS IN 1935

In 1935 the number of unemployed librarians was less than in any year since 1931, according to a report in part I of the January 1936 issue of the Bulletin of the American Library Association. In November 1935, 34 library schools reported that 685 unemployed graduates who had had at least a full year of library science education were seeking positions. This number was about 33 percent below that reported in 1934 by 31 library schools and about 40 percent less than that reported in 1933 by 31 library schools. "In addition, a number equivalent to those graduating from library schools in the years 1934 and 1935, approximately 2,000 have also been placed."

Almost all of the library schools stated that the placement of 1935 graduates was more rapid than that of any classes since 1930.

Approximately one-third of the librarians who were not employed and were looking for positions at the time of the report completed their library course in 1932 or 1933, when there were almost no opportunities for employment in libraries.

The Sun's employment survey showing returns and basis of comparisons

NOTE.—Beginning with this, the fourth report, the arbitrary allotment of 90 percent of 4,025,000 clerical workers to industry, trade, and transportation on a basis of 45, 35, and 10 percent, is abandoned. Clerical workers are now apportioned on the basis of the 1930 United States census, 2,996,000 being credited to industry, trade, and transportation; a majority of the remaining 1,000,000 clerical workers are Government employees

[From the American Federationist for May 1936]

NO PROGRESS IN REEMPLOYMENT

During the first quarter of 1936 American industry has made little or no progress in putting the unemployed to work. The employment gain of 560,000 jobs from January to March is no more than the normal seasonal rise in jobs at this time of year. It must be regarded as purely temporary and accomplishes nothing in permanently reducing the army of unemployed.

In March 1936, 12,184,000 were without work in industry, compared to 12,570,000 in February and 12,646,000 in January. Unemployment decreased by a similar amount last year and also before depression in the spring of 1929. Building is the only industry where gains were more than seasonal; the industry took back 57,000 from January to March. This was offset, however, by the manufacturing industries, which reemployed less than the usual seasonal number.

Trade-union reports give us figures for April and tell a similar story. There has been as yet no progress in putting the unemployed to work in 1936. Union members report that employment gains this year have been less than last year. In 1935, 2.3 percent of the membership found jobs between January and April; in 1936, only 1.7 percent. The weighted figures show the following percentage of union members unemployed: March 1936, 15.5; February 1936, 16.2; March 1935, 19.4.

We are now depending on the Federal Government for 3,878,000 jobs in P. W. A., W. P. A., etc., and in addition relief agencies are caring for about 1,890,000 cases (February 1936).

Hours of work in industry have been lengthened both in February and March this year. Unquestionably this is a chief reason for our failure to make any permanent gains in reemployment. Elsewhere in this month's issue we have pointed out the fact that recovery in employment is falling far behind recovery in business; that we cannot count on industry to put the unemployed to work. America cannot dodge this problem. Businessmen in the past have allowed the Government to deal with it by giving work relief at relief wages. If they plan to continue this policy and still refuse to face the problem, they will do well to remember that millions of American citizens will not indefinitely submit to enforced poverty and public support in an age when industry is equipped to supply them a comfort level of living.

UNEMPLOYMENT, THE WEAK LINK IN RECOVERY CHAIN—PROSPECTS FOR ABSORBING WASTE IN IDLE MANPOWER—CHIEF HOPE SEEN IN CAPACITY PRODUCTION OF DURABLE GOODS

All official calculations of the real capacity of the United States to produce goods and to find consumers for those goods in the years ahead keeps bumping against the question of industry's ability to find jobs for those now dependent on Government for a livelihood.

The depression proved to the satisfaction of President Roosevelt and his advisers that any broad recovery was not possible so long as a big slice of the population was without incomes with which to buy the goods that industry could produce. F. E. R. A., C. W. A., W. P. A., P. W. A., C. C. C., and R. A. became the symbols of Government experiments with the idea of making consumers out of those unemployed in industry by giving them borrowed money to spend.

But now the dominant White House advisers are telling Mr. Roosevelt that this means of stimulating recovery must be checked to prevent the development of a runaway inflationary boom. Arguments are under way over methods of cutting down on Government pump-priming activities. As a result questions like the following arise:

Should Government try to force industry to take up the unemployed by placing a definite top on the hours of work? If present recovery continues until industry passes the 1929 rate of operations, will there even then be jobs for the bulk of those now out of work? Are there signs that this central depression problem is becoming noticeably less important?

NEED FOR INFORMATION

Officials admit that factual answers to those and other questions depend more and more on information that is not available to the Government. After 7 years of depression the Federal Government has no definite knowledge of the real total of unemployed. It does not know what their skills are, what jobs they could fill, how long they have been out of work. What it does know is that a large proportion of those on relief are above the age of 40 and that not many of those remaining on relief have special skills.

And what is known definitely is that 2,500,000 are employed on Works Progress Administration jobs; that 300,000 are at work in C. C. C. camps; that 300,000 farmers are getting help from the Resettlement Administration; that about 1,300,000 families are being cared for by States and localities.

In other words, with the rate of industrial production in striking distance of 1929, and after more than $8,000,000,000 of actual pump priming, about 4,400,000 families, or approximately 17,000,000 individuals—one-seventh of the country's population—are dependent on government for an existence.

WASTE OF HUMAN ENERGY

But from the point of view of the capacity of American industry to produce and consume goods, other figures arrived at by independent studies of the problem are getting even more attention than those of the Government. These figures, soon to be published as part of a survey of the whole problem, show the following:

1. That there are about 53,000,000 employable persons in this country who are interested in employment.

2. That about 12,500,000 of these have been out of employment in the last year, but of this number only about 9,500,000 can really be classed as employable.

HOW RETRIEVE THE WASTE?

3. That in 1932, due to part-time work and complete unemployment, there was a loss of 15,300,000 man-years in human energy, and even today the loss is huge.

The conclusion is drawn that: "Figures show that there has been a greater waste of human energy during the depression than is shown by the general figures of unemployment and that the road of recovery is even longer than is commonly thought."

But in what direction does that road lie? How will it be possible to find an outlet for the wasted energies of this country's millions of unemployed so that they will help add to the productive forces of the Nation and so that they can consume more of the products that industry could turn out if more buyers were able to consume more?

Apparently the country cannot afford to forget about the unemployed; and apparently, judged by present official studies, it cannot afford to subsidize them much longer in the style to which they have become accustomed.

The answer to this dilemma, according to studies soon to be published and to studies undertaken by Government departments, seems to lie in the production of a growing volume of durable goods.

Production of consumers goods, like clothing, shoes, electric power, and the multitude of things that people use in their everyday life has been reaching record proportions of late. Surveys suggest that about as many workers are employed in those industries today as were employed in the predepression years. They no longer are an area of unemployment.

The reason for boom-time spending in the consumers' goods industries is found in the pump-priming activities of the Federal Government. The billions poured into the pockets of the unemployed, together with the billions going weekly into the pockets of those who are employed, resulted in a surge of demand for everyday necessities.

CASE OF DURABLE GOODS

But in the field of durable goods, where normally one-third of the country's employment lies, people are able to delay filling needs or preparing to fill what they think may become future needs. How this situation operates is shown in the figures of durable goods production. That production fell from $32,000,000,000 total in 1929 to $12,500,000,000 in 1932, while consumer goods production fell in value only from $36,800,000,000 to $31,200,000,000. Much of the latter loss has since been regained.

The opportunity for expansion in the durable goods field, however, is shown by the figures for the average of the five predepression years 1925–29. Following is an approximation of the annual spending in that period:

Residential construction	$5,000,000,000
Passenger cars	4,250,000,000
Refrigerators, etc	5,500,000,000
Steam railroads	2,700,000,000
Public utilities	2,200,000,000
Industrial enterprises	7,500,000,000
Agricultural enterprises	1,100,000,000
Public construction	3,700,000,000

The question is whether activity in durable goods can approach the levels of the pre-depression years and whether, if it does, the result would be to soak up the big proportion of the present unemployed.

During the year 1936, according to available estimates, durable-goods production amounted to about $20,000,000,000 compared with the pre-depression total of more than $32,000,000,000.

Actually, according to conclusions now being reached both by Government departments studying the problem and by outside agencies, the accumulated needs of the country are so great that a revival of the capital markets could quickly result in a sharp increase in durable-goods activities. Barring unforeseen complications the expectation is that this increased activity will gradually absorb the unemployed, without resorting to schemes for spreading the work by compulsory shortening of hours.

Reasons for this situation are seen in an analysis of the potential markets that now are beginning to be filled.

RESIDENTIAL CONSTRUCTION

In the 5 years prior to the depression the average number of homes built in this country totaled about 750,000 a year. In the depression this number dropped to 60,000, and while gains were made during the last year the total still is far from that of the earlier periods.

But in the period since 1929 the population of the country has increased, many residences are obsolete or have been abandoned. There are huge potential needs that Government departments estimate to amount to around 900,000 units a year for the next 5 years.

Also at present there are huge supplies of credit seeking investment at rates more reasonable than in the past. Rents are rising even faster than building costs. In some areas it has become less expensive to build than to rent. Gradually, in the official view, the stage is being set for a large-scale home-building revival. If this revival comes, it will create a broad demand for now idle labor.

NEED OF APPRENTICES

One catch, however, is that during depression years few apprentices have been trained in the building trades with a result that difficulty is being found in locating sufficient skilled labor even today. Government competition plays a part in that situation as its W. P. A. and P. W. A. projects demand carpenters and masons.

The capacity of this country to consume automobiles has been a major factor in the business revival that has occurred to date. Of all the durable-goods industries this has shown the most marked improvement, running employment to a point above 1929 with wage payments far in excess of that year.

Even with the large-scale production of the past 2 years, the experts figure that the probable demand during the next 5 years will absorb an average of 4,000,000 cars a year to provide for replacements, additions to the number of car owners, and inventory.

As a result, the economic appraisers for the Government do not expect any particular let-down in this industry, even though it has covered the ground lost in the years since 1929.

HOUSEHOLD MACHINES

Before the depression this country offered a huge market for such items as electric refrigerators, washing machines, electrical household equipment, and a wide variety of other commodities that did not go into consumption to be used up quickly.

But the life of much of this equipment is relatively short and now replacement and new demand is reviving on such a broad scale that it rivals the demand for automobiles as a factor in recovery.

Sales are expected to return to a level over $5,000,000,000 a year and to pass beyond in an era that is marked by increasing consumption of electricity for broader and broader purposes. The prospects in this field are regarded as bright, fitting in with the idea of expanded consumer credit. Estimates for the future are for a business of about $6,000,000,000 a year.

These transportation companies before the depression were a major source of durable-goods spending. They were a major factor in the steel industry and were heavy buyers in other fields, giving employment to at least a million more men than today.

In a depression that placed about one-third of the railroad mileage of the Nation in receivership this industry collapsed as a support for employment. Now it is reviving rapidly under the stimulus of increasing freight and passenger business. There is a huge deficiency to be filled through the purchase of new equipment and new track that is regarded as certain to add to employment.

PUBLIC UTILITIES

Like the consumer-goods industries, the public utilities of the county suffered relatively little loss of business during the depression, but, like some other industries, they called a halt to plant expansions and extensions that formerly provided a large number of jobs.

During the past year the demand for electric power has sent production to a point 15 to 20 percent above 1929. Yet little plant capacity has been added since that time. Demand continues to grow. The result is that officials are convinced that the utilities will be forced to spend money on a large scale during the months ahead in order to fill the needs of their growing number of customers.

The estimate is that utilities will be called upon to spend more money on plant and equipment during the next 5 years than they spent during the 5 predepression years when the yearly total was $2,200,000,000.

INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISES

An era of industrial-plant expansion ended with the start of the depression. The amount of money spent on plant fell off to not much more than 10 percent of the predepression normal.

Now there are beginning to be important signs of expansion. The steel industry has announced large building programs to provide equipment with which to meet a demand that taxes present facilities. The automobile industry is expanding plants. The same is true of the oil industry, the electric-equipment industry, and other important sectors of the industrial set-up.

Such a large slice of the whole durable-goods picture is involved in this line of activity that officials are particularly interested in present developments. The estimate is that as much as $10,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 would be required annually during the next 5 years to put the industrial equipment of this country in efficient shape.

But whether this amount will find its way into this field depends, as it does in other heavy-goods industries, on the ability and willingness of corporations to borrow in the investment markets.

Farm income available for improvement of machinery and of plant is about as large as in 1929. The result is that agriculture is back in the market as an important contributor to recovery in the durable-goods field.

PUBLIC CONSTRUCTION

Before the depression, public and semipublic construction amounted to about $3,500,000,000 annually. It fell to a small fraction of that amount in the first years after 1929, but the present administration has stimulated this form of spending until now it is estimated to be not much below the 1929 level. Some further expansion is expected as local governments and State governments continue to fill needs.

What of employment if all of these industries should return to the rate of operation needed to fill pent-up requirements?

The experts figure that in case any such developments should occur all of the present idle could find jobs and there would be an actual shortage in some lines.

The key to the future of expenditure in these lines lies in the investment markets and in the readiness of the public to put its savings into industrial expansion.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a resolution providing for a study of unemployment was submitted last year, referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and by that committee reported, but when referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate no action was taken. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] has submitted this year a similar resolution, Senate Resolution 36, which was favorably reported by the Committee on Education and Labor, and is now pending in the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I submit articles appearing in the United States News for November 23 and November 16, 1936, showing the urgency of an unemployment census. I ask that these articles be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and I earnestly hope that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will promptly report the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Mexico.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From United States News of Nov. 23, 1936]

MAJORITY OF EDITORS FAVOR JOB CENSUS

Desire of the Department of Commerce that Congress appropriate fifteen to twenty millions for a census of the unemployed is viewed by the public with general approval. Observers see a similar reaction to the President's proposal whereby a self-registration method would be used instead of a door-to-door canvass, making for simpler machinery and economy. In the judgment of 67 percent of the commenting newspapers, the project means better regulation of the supply of labor and, it is believed, curtailment of relief. To 33 percent of the press, the statistics will give a measure of recovery and a better understanding of industrial conditions.

Detailed study of business is tied up with the labor market, in the judgment of most of the editors of the country. It is declared, especially, that industrial leaders should be informed as to the distribution of workers who are fitted for various jobs and as to the number of idle persons who are unemployable.

"An index of national employment" is held by the New York Herald Tribune (Republican) to be a means of understanding the "degree of prosperity that the country has", and that paper emphasizes the "obligations to the victims of industrial uncertainty", with the conclusions that "only so can the Nation plan intelligently for the future", with the certainty that gathering such facts is economy.

"AN IMPERATIVE NEED"

"Economists have contended throughout the last few years," states that Nashville Banner (Independent), "that authentic knowledge of the amount of unemployment was vital to the success of any attack upon it. It has been regarded as an imperative need, especially in the light of variations in official and semiofficial estimates which have confused the size of the actual task of reemployment of still undetermined millions.

"Senator Costigan's efforts to enact such a measure during the last congressional session are recalled, the bill failing because it lacked administration support."

"Such a census," says the San Francisco Chronicle (Independent), "has been urged from responsible quarters for several years. Without it, without reliable information on the number of unemployed, the Government goes it blind in its measures for unemployment relief, particularly in its appropriations."

"We should have," states the Boston Transcript (Republican), "not only knowledge of the state of unemployment but a new business barometer. The number of the idle would supplement car loadings and bank clearings as an indication of the condition of industry."

[From the United States News, Nov. 16, 1936]

COUNTING THE UNEMPLOYED: PLANS FOR A CENSUS—GOVERNMENT CONSIDERS A SURVEY OF BOTH JOBLESS AND EMPLOYED AND A STUDY OF DEPRESSION'S EFFECTS ON THEM

After years of dealing with large-scale unemployment, the Federal Government is giving thought to plans for obtaining a definite official answer to the questions:

How many actually are unemployed? Who are these unemployed and where are they and what are their skills?

Billions have been spent to relieve unemployment; relief plans have been built and abandoned and revived, without specific information concerning the number of individuals who actually needed aid.

Now, with politics out of the way and planning required for the future, plans are revived for a national census of both employment and unemployment.

Definitely:

1. President Roosevelt has told newspapermen that he would give thought to plans for a census on his return from his sea trip.

2. Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, is recommending a census, to cost from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000, and to be made next April or May.

DIFFICULTIES OF CENSUS

In the past, President Roosevelt balked at counting the unemployed. He told questioners that it would be next to impossible to obtain a definition of unemployment and to draw a line between those who should be classed as unemployed and those who should be classed as employed.

His point was that in many families are individuals who might work if the opportunity came their way, but who did not necessarily need or want to work. In other families there might be individuals who gave music lessons one or two days a week or who did occasional nursing. Would they be classed as unemployed if not working on the day the census taker came, or would they be called employed if happening to be giving a lesson or to be occupied with nursing?

The census experts now say that they can work out simple definitions that will overcome objections of this kind.

PURPOSES OF PROJECT

And high Government officials, faced with post-election problems of Government policy, say that they need specific information for two major purposes, which are:

1. To determine whether there really is need for revival of some agency, such as N. R. A., to induce industry to shorten hours or to take other steps to provide work for a larger number of individuals, or whether the unemployed actually are being absorbed at a rate that will result in elimination of the problem with progress of the recovery movement.

2. To determine how much of a reduction can be made in Federal appropriations for work relief, and how much dependence can be placed on old-age assistance to take over a big part of the future relief burden.

If a census is taken according to the plan being worked out by the Government's experts, two sets of questions will be put to the employed and the unemployed.

One set will be brief, designed to determine whether the individual is working, whether that work is full time or part time, whether the worker is at his particular skill, and the type of his occupation.

The second set will be more detailed. Through these questions the Government will endeavor to learn the unemployment history of the individual during the depression years. Has he been unemployed, or if unemployed, how long has he been unemployed? What has he been doing? What types of relief has he had? And a wide variety of other questions aimed at finding out what actually has happened to the workers of this country during the depression years.

Those who are working on census plans say that as much as 3 or 4 months may be required to build the machinery for the task, but that the census itself will require only 1 or 2 weeks.

After that, information would be compiled as quickly as possible and there is some backstage agitation for appointment of a Presidential commission of specialists who would digest the findings and draw conclusions from them. On those conclusions would rest future legislation for dealing with the problem of unemployment.

Also, the proposal is that machinery, once set up, be left in place for frequent use in determining the course of employment. The Federal Employment Service is expected to be tied in with that program if Presidential approval is given.

Just what is the Government's best guess concerning the number of unemployed at the present time?

The Department of Labor provides a monthly report on factory employment, which shows that about a million individuals have returned to factory jobs during the past year.

But that covers only one segment of industry.

MR. NATHAN'S ESTIMATE

In the Department of Commerce, Robert Nathan prepares regular estimates for the International Labor Office at Geneva, and his formula, when applied to the October situation, resulted in an estimate of 8,500,000 unemployed. This compares with approximately 15,000,000 at the depression bottom. It involves a 500,000 reduction since September and a reduction of more than 1,500,000 in recent months.

Mr. Nathan finds that as recovery proceeds employment increases more rapidly. During the first stages of recovery employers tended to give full-time employment rather than to add to the total number of workers. During that period, too, most efficient machinery was at work, requiring a minimum of employees.

But, in recent months, larger production has forced addition of an increasing number of new full-time workers. And production demands are forcing less efficient machinery into use. The result is that employment is found by the experts to be rising faster than it rose in the earlier recovery years.

Even with general information and estimates on the number of those out of work, the Government lacks knowledge of what it considers vital details of the problem.

How many of the unemployed are unemployable? What type of work are the unemployed capable of doing? Is the existing W. P. A. program best fitted to make use of their skills?

RELIEF FIGURES

Harry Hopkins, Administrator of W. P. A., estimates that the number of individuals and families on relief in the United States will be approximately 1,000,000 below the comparable figures for a year ago.

He finds that in August 1936 there were 3,883,000 families and single persons on relief within the country as compared with 4,250,000 in August 1935. But where there was an increase a year ago from this August total to 4,756,000 in January, Mr. Hopkins expects no increase—or at most a relatively small increase—during the present winter. He thinks that reviving employment will reverse the trend of depression years, causing the 1936-37 winter to be one of stationary relief load.

An official W. P. A. report, covering operations for August, said:

"During August 1936 an estimated total of 1,452,000 families and single persons received relief through State and local relief agencies. At this time there were 2,451,000 persons from relief rolls, excluding C. C. C. workers, employed in the United States on the Works Program.

This gives a total of 3,903,000, but it involves an estimated 70,000 duplications.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, Thou hast made us immortal beings with deathless souls; in mercy and in judgment, Thou art calling us night and day. O God, may we hear Thy voice and turn the parched lands of our souls into gardens of spiritual bloom. Grant us faith to realize that Thou knoweth the essence of life to be divine and that Thou art seeking lovingly to manifest Thy divinest works. Let the light and love of the Almighty One rise afresh with healing in His wings and teach men that the supreme passion is to serve. In the midst of the rush and roar of life steady us with tones of tenderness, truth, and courage; feed us with the bread of heaven. Stay our souls on Thy holy word: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, but his delight is in the law of the Lord." In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

Mr. McREYNOLDS (when the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I have quite a number of bills to present.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 19]

Aleshire	Bigelow	Byrne	Cooley
Arnold	Bochne	Cannon, Wis.	Crowther
Barden	Buckley, N. Y.	Celler	Culkin
Bernard	Bulwinkle	Champion	Dempsey
Biermann	Burdick	Connery	Dingell
Disney	Jarrett	Meeks	Secrest

Harrington	Lewis, Md.	Rogers, Okla.	Thom
Havenner	Lord	Ryan	Treadway
Hendricks	McGranery	Scott	Voorhis
Higgins	McSweeny	Scrugham	Wearin

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of two bills I have introduced and to insert a copy of these bills in connection with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I recently made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

(Mr. MAVERICK, Mr. PETTENGILL, Mrs. HONEYMAN, and Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.)

ELECTION TO A STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 119

Resolved, That GEORGE J. BATES, of Massachusetts, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present another resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House Resolution 120

Resolved, That FRED L. CRAWFORD, of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The resolution was agreed to.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The Chair laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1937.

Hon. W. B. BANKHEAD,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a Member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

FRED L. CRAWFORD.

The resignation was accepted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 148. An act to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936.

The message also announced that the Senate had ordered that the Secretary request the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 204) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE NETHERLANDS FOR THE ACCOUNT OF MIGUEL PAULA

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2910) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of the Netherlands for the account of the family of Miguel Paula, and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would it not be well for the chairman of the committee to make a statement in regard to this bill as well as others of similar nature?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am going to do that.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman do that later in order to make the record complete?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes. I may say, Mr. Speaker, there are quite a number of these bills, most of which involve small claims. These bills passed the House last session by unanimous consent. They should have been brought in at this time in an omnibus bill, but through oversight separate bills have been introduced. There are 15 of these bills on the calendar, and it has become necessary to call them up for consideration today. All of these bills cover claims for liabilities which we concede to be liabilities to subjects of various foreign governments.

It is now my purpose to call up these different claims involving various foreign subjects where the countries involved do not owe this Government one penny. There are some 8 or 10 of these bills, and I should like to have them considered en bloc. I have merely called this one first in order to let the House understand the character of bill that is involved. I should be pleased, however, to have this bill considered with other bills on the calendar, which are: H. R. 2915, a small Chinese claim; H. R. 2916, another small Chinese claim; H. R. 2918, another Chinese claim; H. R. 2919, another Chinese claim; H. R. 2920, for the Dominican Republic; H. R. 2921, another Chinese claim; H. R. 2922, another Chinese claim; H. R. 2923, a Nicaraguan claim; and also a Mexican claim, H. R. 2917.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Gladly.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, these bills are all of the same character?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What is the total amount of all of them?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. FREY] states that $30,000 is the total for all of the claims.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mind stating what he proposes to do with respect to the remaining five or six bills?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There will only be three or four bills left, and the ranking member of my committee on the minority side wants us, perhaps, to go into Committee of the Whole so we may have some discussion of those bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that the bill (H. R. 2910) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of the Netherlands for the account of the family of Miguel Paula be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of the Netherlands for the account of the family of Miguel Paula, a citizen of the Netherlands, for the death of Paula due to cocain poisoning while a patient at the United States Marine Hospital at New Orleans, La., on January 23, 1931, the sum of $3,500.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the other bills I have mentioned—H. R. 2913, H. R. 2914, H. R. 2915, H. R. 2916, H. R. 2917, H. R. 2918, H. R. 2919, H. R. 2920, H. R. 2921, H. R. 2922, and H. R. 2923—be called up en bloc and be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand these bills have been passed on unanimously by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; and passed unanimously by the House at the last session, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

JANET HARDCASTLE ROSS

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2913) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Canada for the account of Janet Hardcastle Ross, a citizen of Canada, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Canada for the account of Janet Hardcastle Ross, a citizen of Canada, in full settlement of all claims for personal injury resulting from the dropping of a dummy bomb by a United States Navy airplane near Coronado, Calif., on March 27, 1929, the sum of $920.45.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENRIQUETA KOCH V. DE JEANNERET, A CITIZEN OF CHILE

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2914) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Chile for the account of Enriqueta Koch v. de Jeanneret, a citizen of Chile, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Chile for the account of Enriqueta Koch v. de Jeanneret as complete indemnity for injuries to her daughter, Lucia de Jeanneret, of Valparaiso, Chile, occasioned by an assault at Valparaiso by Andrew Stanley Kondek, seaman, United States Navy, on February 4, 1921, and as reimbursement of all expenses caused thereby, the sum of $2,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LI PO-TIEN

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2915) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of Li Po-tien, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of Li Po-tien, a citizen of China, as compensation for personal injuries sustained as a result of an assault committed by Anthony R. Tofil, private, United States marines, at Tientsin, China, on January 2, 1929, the sum of $300.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIM OF CH'U SHIH-HSIANG (CHEU S. ZIANG) AND MA JUI-HSIANG (MO ZUNG POO), CITIZENS OF CHINA

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2916) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of Ch'u Shih-hsiang (Cheu S. Ziang), a citizen of China, the sum of $300, and for the account of Ma Jui-hsiang (Mo Zung Poo), a citizen of China, the sum of $300 in full settlement of all claims for personal injuries sustained as a result of an assault committed by William H. Moon, corporal, United States Marines, at Shanghai, China, on May 26, 1931.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEN. HIGINIO ALVAREZ

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2917) authorizing an appropriation for the payment of the claim of Gen. Higinio Alvarez, a Mexican citizen, with respect to lands on the Farmers Banco, in the State of Arizona, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, of which amount $15,000 is to be paid to the Government of Mexico for the account of Gen. Higinio Alvarez in full settlement of his claim against the United States with respect to the ownership of lands on the Farmers Banco in the State of Arizona, and the remaining $5,000 is to be paid to the executors or administrators of the estate of R. E. Fishburn, deceased, in full settlement of such interest in the said Farmers Banco or the proceeds of the settlement therefor as was acquired by virtue of a grant to R. E. Fishburn dated January 6, 1927, signed by General Alvarez, or by the assignment by General Alvarez dated December 3, 1935, in favor of Mrs. R. E. Fishburn and other heirs of said R. E. Fishburn, or by both such grant and assignment, for distribution according to law: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made unless and until the Secretary of State shall have received from the Government of Mexico satisfactory assurances that no transfer, other than that specified herein, has been made by General Alvarez, or by anyone acting for or under him, of any part of his right, title, or interest in or to the property comprising the Farmers Banco; until the written opinion of the Attorney General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title; and until General Alvarez has given to the United States a quitclaim deed, in such form as may be deemed satisfactory to the Secretary of State, to all of his right, title, and interest in and to all of the land comprising the Farmers Banco, claimed by him under an instrument of grant dated October 22, 1926, signed by the constitutional President of the United Mexican States, or otherwise.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTATE OF CHANG HSI YING

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2918) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain citizens of China, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of the estate of Chang Hsi Ying, in full settlement of all claims arising out of a collision in Chinese waters, on June 2, 1927, between the United States naval vessel Bittern and a Chinese junk, resulting in the drowning of Chang Hsi Ying, a member of the crew of the junk, the sum of $500.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTATE OF LI YING-TING (LI ING DING)

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2919) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of the estate of Li Ying-ting (Li Ing Ding), a citizen of China, the sum of $1,500 as full indemnity for the deaths of Li Yuen Han (Li Yung-hang), Wang Sze (Li Hwang-shih), Chun Wo (Li Chen-Ho), and Foh Ling (Li Fu-lin), the son, daughter-in-law, grandson, and granddaughter, respectively, of Li Ying-ting (Li Ing Ding), resulting from a collision between the junk of Li Ying-ting (Li Ing Ding), and a United States naval vessel on the Yangtze River on July 3, 1925, and for medical and burial expenses incurred by Li Ying-ting (Li Ing Ding), as a result of the collision.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF MERCEDES MARTINEZ VIUDA DE SANCHEZ, A DOMINICAN SUBJECT

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2920) authorizing an appropriation for the payment to the Government of the Dominican Republic for the account of Mercedes Martinez Viuda de Sanchez, a Dominican subject, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of the Dominican Republic for the account of Mercedes Martinez Viuda de Sanchez, a Dominican subject, as a recognition by this Government of the meritorious services rendered by her late husband, Emeterio Sanchez, in rescuing certain members of the U. S. battleship Memphis on August 29, 1916, and to relieve her present financial condition, the sum of $500.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIM OF LING MAU MAU, A CITIZEN OF CHINA

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2921) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of Ling Mau Mau, a citizen of China, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of Ling Mau Mau, a citizen of China, as full indemnity for the personal injuries received by him as the result of a collision between the junk of Wong Miao Tah and a United States naval vessel on the Whangpoo River, Shanghai, China, on May 20, 1930, and for medical expenses incurred by Ling Mau Mau in connection with his injuries, the sum of $1,500.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIM OF YAO AH-KEN, CHIANG AH-ERH (TSIANGE AH ERH), TS'AO JUNG-K'UAN (DZAO YONG KWER), CITIZENS OF CHINA

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2922) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of China for the account of certain Chinese citizens, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of China for the account of Yao Ah-Ken, $1,500; Chiang Ah-erh (Tsiange Ah Erh), $1,500; the family of Ts'ao Jung-k'uan (Dzao Yong Kwer), $1,500, as full indemnity for losses sustained by Yao Ah-Ken, Chiang Ah-erh (Tsiange Ah Erh), and by the family of Ts'ao Jung-k'uan (Dzao Yong Kwer) as the result of a collision between United States Marine Corps truck numbered 1130 and tramcar B. 168, owned by the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ltd., in Shanghai, China, on November 29, 1929.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN CITIZENS OF NICARAGUA

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2923), authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Nicaragua for the account of Mercedes V. de Williams and others, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Nicaragua for the account of Mercedes V. de Williams, a citizen of Nicaragua, as reimbursement for the deterioration of a boat said to have been owned by Mrs. Williams' husband, Fordyce (Frank) Williams, now deceased, and to have been loaned by him to individual members of the Marine Corps stationed at Prinzapolka, Nicaragua, for recreational purposes, and to have been used by them for such purposes in 1928 and 1929, the sum of $75; for the account of Raimunda Valladares de Calderon, the widow of Justo Calderon, and the children of Justo Calderon, a native of Nicaragua, who was shot to death by a member of the United States naval forces on January 30, 1930, the sum of $2,500; for the account of Demetrio Valle, a citizen of Nicaragua, as full indemnity for losses sustained by him as the result of a bombing operation by a United States Marine Corps airplane near Palasagua, Nicaragua, on or about April 11, 1929, the sum of $600; for the account of Salvador Buitrago Diaz, a Nicaraguan citizen, as full indemnity for damages alleged to have been done to his property by United States marines on February 6, 1921, the sum of $1,500; for the account of the following-named families and individuals the sum of $11,700 as a total indemnity for losses sustained as a result of the death or personal injury of Manual Gomez Molino and others during encounters with United States marines in December 1921 and January 1922; (1) to the family of Manuel Gomez Molino, who was killed December 8, 1921, $1,500; (2) to the family of Obdulio Gomez, who was killed December 8, 1921, $1,500; (3) to the family of Guadalupe Balverve (Valverde), who was killed December 8, 1921, $1,500; (4) to the family of Francisco Ramos, who was killed January 25, 1922, $1,500; (5) to the family of Estanislao Rocha, who was killed January 25, 1922, $1,500; (6) to the family of Julio Carballo, who was killed January 25, 1922, $1,500; (7) to the family of Manuel Hernandez, who was killed January 25, 1922, $1,500; (8) to Manuel Pineda, who was wounded December 8, 1921, $150; (9) to Alejandro Malespin, who was wounded December 8, 1921, $150; (10) to Ignacio Doña, who was wounded December 8, 1921, $150; (11) to Manuel Aburto, who was wounded January 25, 1922, $150; (12) to Teofilo Farcia (Teofilo Garcia), who was wounded January 25, 1922, $150; (13) to Pedro R. Vega, who was wounded January 25, 1922, $150; (14) to Gilberto Lopez, who was wounded January 25, 1922, $150; (15) to Juan Ortiz, who was wounded January 25, 1922, $150; for the account of Benjamin Gonzalez, of the city of Managua, Nicaragua, as full indemnity for money expended by him because of his being wounded by shooting by Robert C. Lare, a private of the United States Marine Corps, while on police patrol in said city, the sum of $343.55; for the account of Drs. Enrique Klinghoffer and Br. Rappaccioli, of Diriamba, Nicaragua, in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for professional services, medicines, etc., furnished on November 10 and 11, 1929, to the late Maj. Charles S. McReynolds, United States Marine Corps, who was suffering from numerous stab wounds, the sum of $250; and for the account of Juan Francisco Rivas, a resident of Leon, Nicaragua, the sum of $38.50, of which $32.50 is to reimburse the said Rivas for the cost of medical services rendered to said Rivas and his family and made necessary by an attack upon said Rivas, his wife, and child by two privates in the United States Marine Corps Expeditionary Brigade in Nicaragua, on June 5, 1927, and $6 of which is to reimburse the said Juan Francisco Rivas for clothing of his said wife, damaged during said assault; for the account of Horacio de Jesus Castillo, a citizen of Nicaragua, as full indemnity for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of an assault committed upon him by a member of the United States Marine Corps at Matagalpa, Nicaragua, on February 24, 1931, the sum of $1,000; for the account of Emelina Obando, a citizen of Nicaragua, as full compensation for personal injuries sustained as the result of an assault committed upon her by a member of the United States Marine Corps at Matagalpa, Nicaragua, on November 3, 1931, the sum of $100; for the account of the children of Jesus Diaz, a citizen of Nicaragua, as full indemnity for his death as the result of being struck by a sack of post-exchange supplies dropped from a United States Marine Corps airplane at Matagalpa, Nicaragua, on June 21, 1928, the sum of $300; for the account of Domingo Portillo, of Matagalpa, as reimbursement of expenses paid by him for the funeral of Jesus Diaz, the sum of $21.50; and for the account of José Luis Mongrio, of Matagalpa, as reimbursement for the cost of repairs to the roof of his house in that city damaged by the dropping of a sack of post-exchange supplies from a United States Marine Corps airplane on June 21, 1928, the sum of $80; in all, $18,508.55.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

N. J. MOOSA

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2909, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of N. J. Moosa, a British subject, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If the gentleman will yield time to me, I shall have no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If this request is granted, we shall have no time for general debate, except under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. If the request is granted, the bill will be considered in the House under the 5-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of N. J. Moosa, a British subject, as full indemnity for the personal injuries received by him as the result of a collision between a broker's trap in which he was riding and a United States Marine Corps truck at Shanghai, China, on September 13, 1928, and for medical and hospital expenses incurred by him in connection with his injuries, the sum of $15.59.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. This is a highly important bill and it is a most unusual bill. In fact, I do not believe this Congress or the preceding Congress has ever seen a bill like it before, because it involves the sum of only $15, and such a bill has not found its way recently to the floor of the House. It is not the amount of money, but it is the principle that is involved.

In order that the record may be clear, I was not here on Monday last when a number of Foreign Affairs Committee bills were objected to under unanimous consent, some 14 or 15 of them. A member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs objected to them at my request, and, so that there may be no misunderstanding about it, most of the legislation that comes out of the Foreign Affairs Committee, except a few very important bills, such as neutrality legislation, come out by unanimous consent and are very often considered by unanimous consent. As the ranking member of that committee on the minority side, I feel very strongly that when the Secretary of State and the President ignored the rights of the minority party in not appointing a single representative of the Republican Party as a delegate to the Peace Conference at Buenos Aires, a great fundamental right belonging to the minority party was not only overlooked, but deliberately violated for the first time in our history, since the days of George Washington, contrary to American custom and practice. At every single peace conference of any importance at all, representatives of the minority party are appointed as delegates on our peace missions.

The minority has very few rights and can hardly enforce their rights when the majority is so overwhelming as it is in this body. The only way that I could call attention to the fact that the minority rights had been ignored and practically obliterated by the administration, for the first time in history, was to object to unanimous-consent consideration to every bill that came out of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Sooner or later I suppose that the State Department will find out what the reason for the opposition is. I do not propose to filibuster here today, but there will be other bills coming up by unanimous consent, and I propose to block them for the same reason. It is a matter of principle that transcends, in my view, almost anything that can happen in the Congress. If we permit the Secretary of State or the President to continue this policy in defiance of American traditions, it merely means injecting partisanship into international issues and making all international issues political footballs. The minority is forced to take such action in order to defend its rights. I shall reluctantly be compelled to continue to object to unanimous consent for consideration of bills from the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the gentleman think it fair to the Foreign Affairs Committee to object to bills that come out of that committee merely because he feels the President or the Secretary of State has been guilty of some oversight?

Mr. FISH. It so happens that this matter is one affecting purely foreign affairs. I am not speaking simply in my individual capacity, because I brought the issue up in a recent Republican conference, and the following resolution was adopted unanimously by the Republican conference——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Committee on Foreign Affairs is not in any way responsible for the matter about which the gentleman complains.

Mr. FISH. Certainly not. This is not a personal matter. It is a question of policy and principle, because the Committee on Foreign Affairs is affected by this policy and no other committee in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It occurs to me that it is not quite fair on the part of the gentleman, who usually is very fair.

Mr. FISH. I try to be fair, but I assure the gentleman this is not a personal matter, as it will affect all bills, regardless of by whom introduced, that has the endorsement of the State Department or the President.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman intends, as I understand it, just to object to unanimous consent for the consideration of foreign-affairs bills?

Mr. FISH. That is all.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman tell us now how long he is to keep up these tactics of obstruction, so that we may know?

Mr. FISH. I will tell the gentleman exactly how long. It does not depend on me. It depends upon the Secretary of State. Sooner or later I suppose the Secretary of State will find out that somebody is blocking some of the legisation that he is requesting, and then all he has to do as far as I am concerned is to send for me and say that in the future the rights of the minority party will be protected, and that it will be granted proper representation, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman tell us whom he had in mind that should have been appointed on that commission?

Mr. FISH. I had not anyone in mind except that he should be a bona-fide Republican, and, that is, not a Republican who has deserted the Party to support the candidate of another party. But in this instance there were eight delegates and not one single Republican.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman do us the honor to start back about 1910 and come down to date, and tell us what a bona-fide Republican is?

Mr. FISH. Oh, yes. The gentleman is just as good a politician as I am. He knows exactly what I am speaking about. It is one who supports his party's candidate for the presidency.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I want the gentleman to go back to 1910, though.

Mr. FISH. I am not 70 years of age. I cannot go back that far.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman was active in 1912.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Did I understand the gentleman to say this had been brought up in the Republican conference?

Mr. FISH. Let me read the resolution and the gentleman can ask about it afterward. This is the resolution that was passed by unanimous vote of the Republican conference:

Resolved by the Republican conference of the House of Representatives, That the action of President Roosevelt in failing to appoint a single delegate representing the minority party to the Inter-American Peace Conference held recently at Buenos Aires is contrary to traditional American custom and well-established practice of affording representation to the minority party on every important delegation or mission appointed by the Chief Executive to attend foreign conferences involving the peace of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the action of the President in utterly ignoring the rights of the minority party is to be deplored and condemned as being a violation of the customary usages and practice of American diplomacy from the time of George Washington and tending to destroy the nonpartisan character of such international conferences, and thereby injecting a partisan spirit and making international issues henceforth a political football, to the detriment of the interests and welfare of the American people.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does the gentleman really think Secretary Hull is going to send for him? Not if I know Cordell Hull. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. I am not a bit concerned whether he does or not. I know him pretty well, too, but I will say this to the gentleman, that only a few days ago I was sitting in Grover Whalen's office in New York and he said, "What is the matter, Ham? What is holding up this legislation?" He was referring to the French Exposition bill that they wanted passed appropriating $200,000. I told him why we objected to it by unanimous consent, and he said, "It is just a matter of principle, is it? A matter of policy?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Can I state that to Secretary Hull?" I said, "You can tell that to Secretary Hull any time you want to, but I do not propose to do it. He will find it out soon enough." So he rang up Secretary Hull and tried to get him at Washington. I went about my business, because I am not concerned at all whether the Secretary of State finds out about it or not, but I am concerned with maintaining the principle that is involved, to see that the rights of the minority party are protected, and I propose to do it as far as the rules of the House permit.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. This is the only possible way within my power to protect the rights of the minority. I had one other way if I wanted to filibuster here today on every single one of these 14 or 15 bills and put them in Committee of the Whole, and in that way filibuster through the afternoon, but I never made any other statement, except that I would oppose unanimous consent for the consideration of all bills having the endorsement of the State Department and the President before our committee. It is a very easy thing to do and I will continue to do it when the opportunity offers until we get that assurance that the rights of the minority will be protected.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is wondering whether the Secretary of State got the information?

Mr. FISH. No; I am not wondering nor worrying.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I will give the gentleman positive information that the Secretary has that information. He has not sent for you yet, has he?

Mr. FISH. I am not concerned with getting a free meal from the Secretary of State. I can still pay for my own meals. I am concerned with a fundamental principle that applies to the Democratic Party as well as the Republican, and that will come home to plague both Democrats and Republicans in the future. It is wrong and every single Democrat here knows it is wrong. There is not one Member on either side who will openly defend it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield as long as you will give me the time.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman said he did not want a free meal. I will ask the gentleman if about 3 years ago he did not give out a statement criticizing the administration because no Republicans were being invited to the White House for meals?

Mr. FISH. Precisely. The gentleman raises a partisan issue. That is typical of the tactics of this administration, high-handed, autocratic, and arrogant, growing more so day by day. At the very start of the administration the President had a foreign Prime Minister and the King of Siam as the guests of the Nation and gave several dinners at the White House. He invited 40 or 50 people, and not one single Representative of the minority party. It is not that we Republicans are so broke that we cannot pay for our own meals, but at least there is a principle involved, and that is what we are talking about here.

If the minority party expects to maintain any of its rights to serve on missions dealing with peace and great international issues, then it is obvious under this administration that it must fight for them. It is becoming clearer every day that the administration is establishing a totalitarian state along the lines of fascism or Hitlerism, and the next step will be to abolish not only all the rights of the minority but the party itself and set up a one-party state.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I want to thank the gentleman very much for aiding in getting these bills through today, for I know how the gentleman feels. I listened to the resolution as the gentleman read it. I see that it condemns the practice, but I do not see where the leadership on that side has approved the gentleman's course of action in objecting to all these bills.

Mr. FISH. What does the gentleman mean; what leadership? I am objecting myself, and I happen to be the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I thought this resolution was passed by the minority Members, the Republicans in the House.

Mr. FISH. By all the Republicans in the House by unanimous vote after I had explained this exact situation in detail before the conference.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Then I want to ask the gentleman how long he purposes keeping up these objections?

Mr. FISH. Until we get assurance that the rights of the Republican Party as a minority party will be recognized.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Suppose you do not get any assurance, and suppose the New York World Exposition bill comes before the House.

Mr. FISH. But that is a meritorious piece of legislation.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I agree with the gentleman that it is; but is the gentleman going to object to that?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows that we politicians make an exception to every rule. The gentleman knows that I have already made one exception. I will not, however, make any commitments in advance.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I should like to observe for the information of my friend that if they insist on objecting to all these bills of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that should the gentleman from New York find himself under any personal embarrassment when the New York bill comes up, perhaps some of his friends on this side will accommodate him.

Mr. FISH. We can work it out between us.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is not objecting to the pending bill is he?

Mr. FISH. This bill for $15?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. I want to speak on the merits or demerits of this bill for $15. I do not suppose, seriously, we can object to this little bill that has come out of the committee by unanimous vote, giving some British subject $15. There are half a dozen others of the same nature, one for a citizen of France growing out of some accident in 1916 in Haiti, for $1,000, which with compound interest at 6 percent amounts now to about $2,000. That will make him rich down there.

The question is simply this, and I am not going any further than to raise the question: The Congress of the United States in this bill is appropriating money for Great Britain and will be in the next bill for France, both of which nations owe us money. Why not deduct it from the war debts? They have repudiated their war debts. They do not even pay interest on these debts. They do not even pay interest on the money loaned them after the armistice; and yet the Congress of the United States appropriates money for their citizens, and appropriates it in the name of the British Government and of the French Government. The question of policy comes up. I am not prepared to oppose this bill of $15 merely on the question of policy, but it ought to be considered. Great Britain owes us billions of dollars; she is not paying a single penny in interest; yet we, by unanimous vote, probably will pay to Great Britain some money for one of her subjects injured somewhere in China. We could, if we wanted to, call attention to this fact and vote down these bills. Personally I do not think that that is the proper and right way to do it, at the expense of some little fellow who needs this $15 more than the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman tell us what his party did with regard to war debts?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I shall be very glad to tell the gentleman what we did. I want the record to be known. When this country was under Republican administrations we collected every year $200,000,000 in payment of interest on the war debts. Under the present Democratic administration we do not collect anything except from little honest Finland—not one penny otherwise.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is not the gentleman mistaken?

Mr. FISH. Not a bit.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I seem to remember that just before President Hoover went out he asked for a moratorium.

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And that is where we got stuck.

Mr. FISH. Near the expiration of President Hoover's term of office he communicated with Governor Roosevelt, then President-elect, and asked him to cooperate in a settlement of these war debts, but President-elect Roosevelt sent back word, "Oh, no; I will not cooperate."

"I propose to settle these debts. I propose to adjust them in my own way, and that will be the first objective of my administration."

Then what happened? The administration has been in power for 4 years and it has not made an attempt even to collect any of the war debts and the Government of the United States is not receiving any payment on these debts except from Finland. That is the record, and I want it to stand.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman has just quoted President Roosevelt. Is the gentleman quoting him from any public utterances or from some private conversation?

Mr. FISH. I am not literally quoting him. I am quoting what the papers had to say, I think it was in November 1932, right after the election when President Hoover asked for his cooperation in the settlement of the war debts. Of course, I do not know what was in the mind of President-elect Roosevelt at that time, but he said, "I am going to settle these debts. That will be one of the first objectives of my administration." And 4 long years have gone by and he has not made the slightest attempt to collect these debts. If he had made an attempt that would be something, but not a single effort has been made to collect a penny from any of these nations.

Mr. SHANLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SHANLEY. On June 1, 1934, the President sent a message to the House of Representatives on World War debts. I would advise the gentleman to read that message, then come back here and make a statement.

Mr. FISH. What has happened to the war debts? The President had been in office 15 months when he sent in the message and has done nothing since.

Mr. SHANLEY. The President made certain statements in that message. He had lined up with President Hoover on three fundamentals.

Mr. FISH. What is his position? He has been in power for 4 years. What is his proposal?

Mr. SHANLEY. His proposal is that those nations who are indebted to us make deliberate and conscientious attempts to pay the debts and not to proceed in unproductive militaristic efforts. The President of the United States has worked out reciprocal-trade agreements with various nations, and tied up with these agreements is the necessity to carry on at all fronts. He cannot carry out these reciprocal-trade agreements without giving these nations some time. I would ask the gentleman to read that statement.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman mean to say when we enter into these reciprocal-trade agreements we thereby cancel these war debts?

Mr. SHANLEY. No.

Mr. FISH. What has been done to secure a single penny?

Mr. SHANLEY. The gentleman is very learned, and he knows these war debts can be paid only in gold, by the purchase of goods, or the rendering of services. The gentleman's party is opposed to the introduction of imports. These war debts can only be paid by getting imports from the countries which owe us the money, or services or gold or articles of highly intrinsic value. There is not enough gold in most of the countries to pay the war debt.

The gentleman ought to know that, and I am sure he does know it, because he is a student of this matter. He knows that this whole matter is tied up with world currency, international exchange and reciprocal-trade agreements. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has made his speech; but does the gentleman know that this morning's paper states that high officials in Great Britain, and we are discussing that particular country in the pending bill for the payment of $15 to a British subject, made the announcement that she proposes to spend seven and a half billion dollars on armament for the next 5 years? Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. SHANLEY. The same paper made the statement it was three billion dollars 3 or 4 days ago.

Mr. FISH. I saw that, too.

Mr. SHANLEY. Today it is $7,000,000,000. I am waiting for the correct figures.

Mr. FISH. Would the gentleman agree with either figure?

Mr. SHANLEY. That they are going to do that?

Mr. FISH. Yes; for purposes of armament.

Mr. SHANLEY. Yes.

Mr. FISH. And they are not paying us the war debt. Who is holding the bag?

Mr. SHANLEY. Who is holding it?

Mr. FISH. The American people.

Mr. SHANLEY. No; I will tell the gentleman about that: He refers to the $200,000,000 that we have collected. Why should we not have collected it? As long as our American financiers were lending money to England, Germany, and France they had the money, but just as soon as we stopped that they no longer could pay the war debts. We were robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Mr. FISH. How do they pay for their armament if they cannot pay these war debts?

Mr. SHANLEY. That is an internal question, but you may rest assured that the President, in the fullness of his knowledge as indicated in the 1934 message, will fulfill his duty to the Congress.

Mr. FISH. Where do we come in? If the President does not raise his finger to collect these war debts, we will not collect any. And the American people will continue to hold the bag. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIM OF HENRY BORDAY, A CITIZEN OF FRANCE

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2911) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the French Government for the account of Henry Borday, a citizen of France, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to ask the gentleman a question. I notice in this bill authorizing payment of the claim there is allowed 6-percent interest annually for over 20 years. I do not remember seeing any such provision carried in any similar bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FREY], who is chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. The bill does not provide for interest, but is a request for $1,000 on account of injuries sustained in 1916.

Mr. SNELL. The bill states:

The sum of $1,000 with simple interest at 6 percent per annum from October 3, 1916, until January 2, 1937.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman reading from the report or the bill?

Mr. SNELL. I am reading from the bill.

Mr. FREY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is right. The bill does call for interest.

Mr. SNELL. I have never known us to do any such thing with respect to any of these claims.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I quite agree with the gentleman, and we will offer an amendment striking out the provision with respect to interest.

Mr. SNELL. We do not do that for our own citizens, and I presume the gentleman will offer such an amendment?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the French Government for the account of Henry Borday, a citizen of France, as compensation for personal injuries sustained by him due to an assault at his place of business at Port au Prince, Haiti, by two United States marines on October 3, 1916, the sum of $1,000 with simple interest at 6 percent per annum from October 3, 1916, until January 2, 1937.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: Line 9, after "$1,000", strike out "with simple interest at 6 percent per annum from October 3, 1916, until January 2, 1937."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SHANGHAI ELECTRIC CONSTRUCTION CO., LTD.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2912) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ltd., and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of the Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ltd., as full indemnity for losses sustained by the said company as the result of a collision between United States Marine Corps truck no. 1130 and tramcar B. 168, owned by the company in Shanghai, China, on November 29, 1929, the sum of (the equivalent of $157.20 Mexican) $78.60.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN BRITISH CITIZENS

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2925) authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of certain British citizens and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment to the Government of Great Britain for the account of the estate of Samuel Richardson, as full indemnity for the death of Samuel Richardson, who is alleged to have been killed at Consuelo, Dominican Republic, by United States marines on May 1, 1921, the sum of $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELEVENTH INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS, BERLIN, GERMANY, 1937

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 193) to authorize an appropriation for the expenses of participation by the United States in the Eleventh International Dairy Congress, Berlin, Germany, in 1937.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. How many people do we send to one of these international dairy congresses?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The last time I think there were 2, and the number has been as high as 10. They expect to send 10 this year.

Mr. SNELL. You are going to send 10 people over there?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; there will be quite a number of other citizens who will go and will perhaps be given the same authority, but their expenses, and so forth, will not be paid by the Government.

Mr. SNELL. What will be the qualifications of the 10 who will go over at Government expense and how will they be selected?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They will be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SNELL. Will there be fair representation from every part of the country?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They will be men who are familiar with the dairy industry, and selected from all over the country, of course.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman suppose I could have one appointed from northern New York by recommending a good Democrat?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think the gentleman ought to have one because of the cheese industry in that section.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And I will help the gentleman get one, and I am sure the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the Eleventh International Dairy Congress, to be held in Berlin, Germany, in 1937, an appropriation in the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, stenographic reporting and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent; traveling expenses, purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers, and periodicals; official cards, printing and binding; entertainment; local transportation and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payment may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, at the end of the bill insert:
"SEC. 2. That the delegates shall make a report to Congress of the results and conclusions of the said dairy Congress."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, that completes my calendar. I want to say that there are a lot of small bills, but, as the Secretary of State has the right, as have other departments, to settle all claims up to $1,500, I will not bother the House with them. I thank the House very much for its consideration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, one of the bills reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee is of rare interest and raises an important collateral question. I refer to H. R. 2915, recommending payment of $300 to one Li Po-tien, a native of China. Had the report been written in breezy journalese it would probably read something like this: Li Po-tein is an olive-skinned oriental charmer who lives in Tientsin, China. Li operates a restaurant and bar. There she dispenses food to the hungry and drink to the thirsty. Li must be a discerning creature, because she soon learned the Yankee art of extending credit. Now, even in far-off China, one cannot indulge so superb a Yankee custom as meat and drink on the installment plan without attracting Yankee customers. And so it came about that members of the United States Marine Corps became customers of quaint little Li.

One such customer was Pvt. Anthony R. Tofil, private in the United States Marine Corps. We shall call him Tony for short. Tony wandered into Li's emporium shortly after midnight on January 3, 1929. It may be that Tony still believed it was New Year's eve. Maybe not. In any event Tony was feeling playful. Playfulness on the part of a fighting marine may have connotations other than those ordinarily associated with the word. In any event Tony's playfulness took the form of a one-man offensive. The record indicates that Tony took out a knife. Probably he made a resounding speech and challenged all China to battle. He, peradventure, dared the shades of all the shogans and shamens of that illustrious country. Perhaps he even challenged the household gods of the land of lotus and cherry blossoms. Then Tony went to work.

The record discloses that Tony cut Li about the hands. He cut her about the arms. He cut her about the face. He cut her about the back. He cut her about the chest. We even assume that Tony wounded her feelings. On that point the prosaic record is silent. It was a vigorous offensive, to say the least, whereafter it became necessary to take Li to the hospital for sundry repairs. Tony meanwhile was apprehended and brought before a general court martial and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. If there has been neither pardon nor reprieve, Tony is probably still in prison meditating on things occult and oriental.

Li came back from the hospital restored to body and spirit and no doubt resumed the time-honored custom of permitting the good folks to share her generous hospitality and pay later. Li probably took inventory after the inevitable hospital bill was presented, and concluded that the great and wealthy occidental country that parked Tony in Tientsin ought to assuage her wounded pocketbook. The repairs to Li's face and figure had cost $54. So Li rendered her bill in true Yankee fashion. The claim was investigated by a United States naval board. They decided that, as a matter of simple justice, without acknowledging any liability, Li should receive some compensation, and so today we are considering that matter in Congress in the form of H. R. 2915, which provides $300 to assuage Li's wounded feelings and reimburse her for the hospital expense. It is more than 8 years since Tony licked a Chinese lady, and unless the fates intervene, there may soon be rejoicing in the house of Li as some official of this Government bears to Li a check for $300. On that day probably all of Li's customers will be treated to roast little pig and extra rice and tea as Li praises the greatness, the goodness, and the generosity of the land to the west where the sun sets.

The point to this incident, however, is this: What was Tony doing over there? Why have him in China? Why have any troops in China? If they serve no useful or necessary purpose, why not withdraw them from China and avoid these petty frictions that may one day cause us trouble? To revise an old adage, great wars from little frictions spring, and these frictions can be avoided by withdrawing those troops.

I am informed that today we have approximately 2,306 American soldiers in China. Of this number, 696 are with the Army and 1,110 with the marines. They were stationed there 36 years ago under the provisions of a treaty of 1901. Ostensibly it was an arrangement with other nations to guard the international railroad. The original reason for maintaining them in China has no doubt disappeared and today they are there because they were there. They are like the wet paint sentry of Queen Victoria's time. Her Majesty was coming down a freshly painted staircase one day and her imperial wrap brushed against the paint. She insisted on having a sentry placed at the turn in the staircase so it would not happen again. The paint dried soon after, but the sentry remained for 16 years. Is it not time in the interest of preserving peace that we take a direct step toward avoiding such provocations as this by withdrawing our troops from China?

Just what could 2,306 American soldiers do if John Chinaman was really aroused. Our whole contingent of troops in China could easily be packed in this House Chamber. To say that they are guarding our interests in China is hardly persuasive. Good will alone will guard our interests, and if that fails, 2,306 soldiers stationed 7,000 or 8,000 miles from home would be of little consequence. To preserve that good will against the petty, irking provocations which may some day destroy it, we better instruct our soldiers to break camp and come back home.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may have leave to sit during the sessions of the House for the next 3 legislative days in the consideration of important bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

Mr. HILL of Alabama (when the Committee on Military Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2291) to amend the act of May 25, 1933 (48 Stat. 73), unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman notified the minority members of the committee that he was going to call this bill up today?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It has been reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. SNELL. It is always right and fair to notify the minority members.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. As I said, the bill was reported unanimously by the committee, and I see that the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], the ranking minority member, has now entered the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved May 25, 1933 (48 Stat. 73), be amended by changing the period at the end of the act to a colon and by adding the following words: "Provided, That on and after the date of the accrediting of the said academies by the Association of American Universities the superintendents of the respective academies may, under such rules and regulations as the respective secretaries may make, confer the degree of bachelor of science upon all living graduates of the said academies."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Alabama ought to explain the bill.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I am going to explain it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, up to May 25, 1933, the graduates of the Military Academy and the Naval Academy were not given a degree by these academies on graduation.

On that date Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War to confer the degree of B. S. on graduates of these academies when accredited by the Association of American Universities.

The Association of American Universities is an association of the different colleges and universities of the country which sets the standards for the different colleges and universities.

The pending bill would permit the superintendents of these two academies, under regulations formulated by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, to confer a B. S. degree on those living graduates who graduated prior to the passage of the act of May 25, 1933.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The former graduates of Annapolis and of West Point have never had any degrees?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No graduate of either one of these academies received a degree until the passage of the act of May 25, 1933. Since that time graduates of these two academies have had conferred upon them the degree of bachelor of science.

Mr. SNELL. And the bill is to confer a degree upon graduates prior to that time?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. In the current year there will be a number of diplomas or degrees issued. Has the committee considered the matter of expense in going back over a number of years and preparing parchments for each graduate?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Each man will have to pay for his parchment himself, just as I understand the graduates of practically all of our American colleges and universities pay for their own parchments.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue with the call of committees.

REQUIREMENTS OF APPLICANTS FOR EXAMINATION BEFORE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. RAMSPECK (when the Committee on the Civil Service was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2928) to amend the law relating to residence requirements of applicants for examinations before the Civil Service Commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of the second paragraph under the caption "Civil Service Commission" in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes", approved July 11, 1890, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Hereafter every application for examination before the Civil Service Commission for appointment in the departmental service in the District of Columbia shall be accompanied by a certificate of an officer, with his official seal attached, of the county and State of which the applicant claims to be a citizen, that such applicant was, at the time of making such application, a legal or voting resident of said county, and had been such resident for a period of not less than 1 year next preceding, but this provision shall not apply to persons who may be in the service and seek promotion or appointment in other branches of the Government."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please explain the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR of New York). The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I introduced this bill at the request of the president of the Civil Service Commission, to correct an error that was made in the act of June 18, 1929, when we repealed the act of March 3, 1919, which contained a provision relative to residence in civil-service examinations. Therefore the provision reverted back to an old law requiring 6 months actual residence in the State, and the Commission feels that under this old law a person must have actual residence and not legal or voting residence, which, of course, would mean that people who come to Washington and take positions would lose their residence back in the States. This proposal that we have before us simply fixes the residence required. If a person wants to seek appointment in the departmental service in Washington and has a residence in New York, for instance, the time required to fix it is 1 year, and it shall be proven by a certificate from a local official where the person lives.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know that I am entirely clear. If one has been a resident of the State of New York for 1 year, he can come under the New York apportionment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. It simply means they become residents for 1 year?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. That is all this bill does?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It provides that they can qualify by what we call legal or voting residence, even though they might be employed in a non-civil-service agency. They could still maintain their legal residence in New York.

Mr. SNELL. A great many people employed here do maintain their legal residence back home.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then this bill is really a protection for the States?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I call the gentleman's attention to line 8, where the word "service" is used. Should not that be preceded by the word "departmental" to be clear?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, the bill applies only to the departmental service. I don't think that would be necessary, although I would have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. TABER. It might be construed as meaning any Government service anywhere. It says "departmental" in line 11, on page 1.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes. It applies only to persons seeking appointment in the departmental service.

Mr. TABER. I think it would be safer if the word "departmental" were inserted there.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Personally, offhand, I can see no objection to it. If the gentleman wants to offer that sort of an amendment, I shall not object, though I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. DITTER. Does this measure in any way affect the status of those people who are presently employed here and not under civil-service status?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Only in case they compete in a competitive examination for appointment in the departmental service.

Mr. DITTER. Does not this really permit those who have been here without civil-service status to come under a registration back home and, therefore, come within the State allotments?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It means, that if they apply to take an examination for the departmental service here they can establish their residence by certificate from some proper official in the State in which they claim residence.

Mr. DITTER. And that is the real purpose of the measure?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is right. Under the present law it is difficult to establish the residence required, which is 6 months' residence in a State.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I would like to inquire, and I am sure the gentleman from Georgia knows, how much out of line are the allotments of appointments for the District of Columbia as compared with the States?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not remember the figures, of course, but the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia are considerably over quota. There are some other States that have recently passed their quota under the apportionment act. That condition has existed for a great many years, so I am informed.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The purpose of this measure is to correct that condition?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes, to a certain extent. It will enable the Commission to more strictly enforce the apportionment act.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Assuming that someone has come here to take employment in the Government, in a nonservice position, and has been here 10 years from the State of Massachusetts or Kentucky, and they have not voted in Massachusetts or Kentucky for 10 years, what are the rights of such person to take an examination under this bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Under this bill they would have to secure a certificate of an officer with his official seal attached, of the county and State in which they claim legal or voting residence. Whether or not they can establish that residence, of course, will depend on the local State law. The requirements vary in different States.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would such person have to show that they actually voted in the State?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think it would be necessary to show that they had voted, but I think they would have to show that under the laws of that State they were entitled to be called a legal or voting resident of that State.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And entitled to vote?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman said something about a tax certificate.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No. There is no tax certificate. It is just a certificate from an officer of the State or county where they claim residence, showing that they are a citizen of that county and State.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How many persons are now employed by the Government who have this nonservice status, employed in the District of Columbia? Does the gentleman have any figures on that?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I could not tell the gentleman how many people in the District of Columbia are not under civil service. There are something over 300,000 in the entire country who are not under civil service, but what proportion of those are in the District of Columbia I do not know.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. It would be to the advantage of those who are working in the District to maintain a legal residence in some other State, would it not?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think so, because of the apportionment law.

Mr. BOILEAU. Perhaps it is not directly connected with this particular bill, but I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to what would happen in the event we should pass a bill giving to the residents of the District of Columbia the right of franchise. These people who are working under civil service would not be voters of the District. I mean they would not want to give up their voting residence in the various States, so that a large number of people who are to all intents and purposes actually residents of the District would not, as a matter of fact, vote if the people of the District were given the right of franchise.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think that is right.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think that is one thing that the people of the District of Columbia should bear in mind, that if they want their right of franchise there should be some provision in the law to the effect that those who actually reside here, whether under civil service or not, are expected to vote in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Perhaps the gentleman is correct.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Do I understand the gentleman to say this will correct the condition existing at the present time, or at least which existed at the end of 1936, where the District of Columbia is entitled to 154 civil-service appointments and has 9,030, where they have more than 30 other States in this Union? Will this bill tend to correct that situation?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman that I did not make any such statement. I said that the passage of this bill would assist the Commission in enforcing the apportionment law, as it is called.

Mr. FADDIS. It will tend to rectify that condition which exists, where the District gets all of the civil-service appointments, as they do at the present time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It will assist the Commission in determining the residence of applicants. Of course, that is the first step in applying the apportionment law. I do not mean to say it will take anybody out of a job that they already have. I do not want any misapprehension about it. It would not do that; but in future appointments it will enable the Commission to definitely settle the question of residence.

Mr. FADDIS. Is there not a regulation in force at the present time whereby appointments are supposed to be apportioned throughout the various States according to population?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is in the original civil-service law.

Mr. FADDIS. Then how does it come that the Civil Service Commission has allowed this unbalanced condition which prevails today to occur?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think I could undertake to explain that to the gentleman at this time. I will say there are a great many reasons for it. One of them is the situation that existed during the World War, when thousands and thousands of people were brought in without regard to the apportionment law, because it was a question of the Government employing any help that was available anywhere. There was a shortage of help. They took them in. Now, the apportionment law does not apply to separations from the service. The District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia, therefore, have become overquota under the apportionment act and have remained that way. Another reason why they are overquota is that people from distant States will not come here to accept the lower-paid positions, and a major portion of the smaller-pay positions have been filled from territory surrounding Washington, because people are not willing to come here from long distances to accept such positions.

Mr. FADDIS. I may state to the gentleman, and to the Members generally, that in a few days I am going to insert some figures in the RECORD that will show just how the apportionment of civil-service jobs has been handled throughout the United States, and how the jobs have been distributed.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman cannot be any more interested in that than I am. I am in favor of the apportionment law and will help do anything I can to enforce it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Permit me to call attention to the fact that employees who have been under civil service more than half a dozen years still have a temporary status, even though they passed a competitive examination. They are being carried along in a temporary status. The State of Texas is one of those States which stands way down on the quota list. There is no complaint of the efficiency of these people carried so long in a temporary status. Why should they not be given a permanent status? Why can we not correct the situation?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Individual cases of that sort, of course, must stand on their own merits. I shall be very glad to do anything I can to help the gentleman correct any case of that sort of which he knows.

Mr. McFARLANE. Not only that, but these people have proof that people from the District of Columbia, from Virginia, and Maryland with a shorter length of service have been placed in the permanent status, whereas people from the State of Texas have not been given a permanent status. I think it is a matter that ought to be looked into, especially when we find arrogant people in some of these departments saying that quotas do not mean anything to them.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman that I believe in the apportionment law, and I will do anything I can to help see that it is enforced.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. GREEVER. Is the rule with reference to the applicant getting a certificate from a county officer being enforced at the present time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. There is no such requirement under the present law. At the present time a person must show actual residence of 6 months in the State from which he or she claims to come. It is rather difficult to establish those facts. The Commission wants to set up this plan restoring the 1-year period which was inadvertently repealed in the act of 1929, and permit proof to be made by certificate of an officer of the State in which the employee claims residence.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. In view of the statement made by the gentleman and others with regard to Maryland being beyond its quota, which I concede to be the case, representing a large part of Maryland, I want it understood that my district is not in that class, although counties bordering on the District may be. The reason for that is that so many Government employees appointed during the World War and at other times took up their residence in the State of Maryland. Coming here from Georgia, Texas, California, and elsewhere because they found Maryland to be a delightful place in which to live and make their future homes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. Some of the cases under the apportionment law have arisen in just that way, the person has come from my own State, settled in Maryland and acquired citizenship there. Thereafter, of course, he is charged to Maryland.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The pending bill requires the certificate of an officer. It seems to me this should be clarified and the kind of officer stated, whether it is an officer of the court, an officer of the law, an officer of the Army, or some other kind of officer. It seems to me this phrase should be made plain, as there is a requirement about legal or voting residence.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think it is better to leave the language as it is, I may say to the gentleman, for the reason that in one State they may have an election official who does that. In my State it would be done by the tax officials who keep the registration records. We cannot set out the particular official in each of the 48 States. The Commission, however, will require this certificate from the proper official who keeps the records in each State of the residence and voting qualifications.

Mr. EBERHARTER. In other words it will be up to the Commission to make proper regulations as to each State and as to each officer or what kind of an officer in each State must make this certificate.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What information came to the gentleman's committee that decided the committee to report this bill out at the present time? What is back of this?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from New York that this bill was sent to the committee by the Civil Service Commission in the Seventy-fourth Congress, was passed by the Senate, and the House had reported the Senate bill, but it got lost in the final rush. This is simply a repetition of that request.

Mr. SNELL. I was wondering, after this had gone along so many years, why they are now seeking to change the civil-service requirements.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The act of June 18, 1929, repealed in its entirety the act of March 3, 1919, and also repealed the statute relating to the requirement of legal residence and actual domicile in the case of examinations held by the Civil Service Commission for positions in the District of Columbia. I think, as a matter of fact, nobody realized that that law had been repealed by this act of 1929 until about 2 years ago.

It is just to make that correction that this bill is brought up.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR of New York). Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] yield for that purpose?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York for that purpose; yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 2, line 8, after the word "service", insert "with civil-service status."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2901) to amend the act of May 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 349), for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service and in certain positions in the legislative branch of the Government to include all other employees in the legislative branch, and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we better find out about these bills. This particular bill is pretty far-reaching.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from New York this is a bill which the House passed during the last session and simply permits legislative employees to take advantage of the Civil Service Retirement Act. It is not mandatory. It is permissive.

Mr. SNELL. The legislative employees?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The employees of the House and Senate and our individual offices?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to understand what the gentleman means by "legislative employees"?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They are defined in the bill. That includes officers elected by the Senate or House of Representatives who are not members of either body, the legislative counsel of the Senate and the legislative counsel of the House and the employees in their respective offices, the Capitol police force, the employees of the Joint Committee on Printing and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and clerks to Members of the Senate, clerks to Members of the House of Representatives, clerks and employees to the several committees of the House and Senate, and all other employees.

Mr. RAYBURN. What does the phrase "clerks to Members" mean?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It means, if they want to avail themselves of the privileges of the Retirement Act within 6 months after the passage of this act, they shall notify the Clerk of the House, and thenceforth the Clerk of the House deducts 3½ percent of their salaries to pay into the fund. If they want to get credit for previous service they have to pay up the amount due for that previous service under the act. They will then have all the privileges that the civil service employees have with reference to the Retirement Act; but it has nothing to do with the selection or appointment of employees, and it does not force them to retire. They are exempted from the age limit.

Mr. RAYBURN. It in no way puts the clerks to Members of the House and Senate under the civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; it does not.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this include the secretaries to the Congressmen?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2901, with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 349), for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service and in certain positions in the legislative branch of the Government, is hereby amended to include all other employees in the legislative branch.

SEC. 2. The provisions of such act of May 29, 1930, shall not be applicable to any employee in the legislative branch who is brought within its scope by section 1 of this act until such employee gives notice in writing to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, that he or she desires to come under the provisions of such act of May 29, 1930. Such notice must be given, in the case of any such employee in the service on the effective date of this act, within 6 months from such effective date, and in the case of any such employee entering the service after the effective date of this act, within 6 months from the date of such entrance.

SEC. 3. The provisions of section 2 of such act of May 29, 1930, and of section 204 of the Economy Act of June 30, 1932, and any Executive orders pursuant thereto, relating to automatic separation, shall not apply to any employee in the legislative branch to whom the provisions of such act are extended by this act.

SEC. 4. The term "employee in the legislative branch" where used in this act shall also include (a) officers elected by the Senate or House of Representatives who are not members of either body, (b) the legislative counsel of the Senate and the legislative counsel of the House and the employees in their respective offices, (c) the Capitol Police force, (d) the employees of the Joint Committee on Printing and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and (e) clerks to Members of the Senate, clerks to Members of the House of Representatives, clerks and employees to the several committees of the House and Senate, and all other employees.

SEC. 5. In computing annuitable service, all employment prior to July 1, 1919, as clerk to a Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in his representative capacity shall be recognized as employment in the legislative branch if and when such employment can be shown by records or secondary evidence, and in the case of applications heretofore awarded or denied such cases shall be immediately reopened and readjudicated on the above basis from the date of separation, this provision to become effective from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 6. This act shall take effect on October 1, 1937.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the members of the committee for a few minutes, I think I can clear up the misunderstanding that apparently some members have with reference to the bill.

This is a proposal that has been pending in the Congress for a great many years. The House Committee on the Civil Service has several times favorably and unanimously reported this legislation. It has passed the House several times, and it passed the House in the last Congress and went over to the Senate, where they substituted an entirely different plan, but it was never acted on in the Senate.

We have what is known as the Retirement Act, which applies automatically to all civil-service employees. This has been extended by legislative enactment to certain other groups in the Federal service, such as the employees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. We extended it to them last year but did not bring them under the civil service.

The proposal here is to permit, not require, secretaries to Members of Congress, employees of the House and Senate, the Capitol Police force, and other employees enumerated in the bill, generally known as legislative employees, to take advantage of the Retirement Act, provided they desire to do so.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Just what would one of these employees have to do in order to come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. RAMSPECK. He would notify the Clerk of the House if he is an employee of the House, or the Sergeant at Arms office, or the Secretary of the Senate on the Senate side, and thereafter 3½ percent of that employees' salary would be put into this fund.

Mr. SNELL. Would the employee have to pay anything for previous years of service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. If they want credit for the previous service, they would have to pay.

Mr. SNELL. They would have to pay for that?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They would have to pay back to 1920, which was the time the law went into effect.

Mr. SNELL. But if they want to start in as of the present time, they may pay from now on?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. There is no time limit? They can come in now and do not have to pay for the number of years service before this time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct. They can come in now and we have relieved them from the mandatory retirement provisions of the act, so that if you have an employee in your office who reaches retirement age and you want to keep that employee, you can keep him, while, on the other hand, he may avail himself of the provisions of the Retirement Act.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Assuming a clerk of a Member of Congress has had 10 years of service in that capacity and is not able to pay up for the entire 10-year period, but would like to start beginning 5 years ago, could he pay up for part of the time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I think that would be permitted. They would get credit for any service they paid for back to the time when they entered the service.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Suppose a young lady has worked here as secretary for 10 or 12 years and has paid into the fund, but is not reappointed at the next Congress, what would happen to her?

Mr. RAMSPECK. If she had not had enough service to retire on an annuity, every dollar that she paid in, plus 4-percent interest, compounded annually, would be returned to her when she left the service.

I may also say to the gentleman from Maryland that any employee who avails himself or herself of the provisions of this act and for any reason is separated from the service, we will say, in 5 years, gets back every dollar paid in, plus 4-percent interest. In that case all it amounts to is a savings account.

Mr. PALMISANO. How many years of service are necessary before they will be able to receive these benefits?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They have to be in the service at least 15 years to get the retirement benefits.

Mr. PALMISANO. After 15 years of service, in the event the individual is not reappointed, is there any age limit, or can they voluntarily come in under this system and receive the benefits?

Mr. RAMSPECK. After 15 years of service, if they are separated from the service, they can retire on an annuity, provided the separation was not for cause.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Suppose they retire from the service before the 15 years have elapsed?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They do not get an annuity, but get their money back, plus 4 percent interest.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. If a secretary has already served 15 years and would wish to go into this, would the basis for receiving an annuity be the back payments by that secretary through a period of 15 years, and would those payments make the secretary eligible for an annuity? In other words, how great is the retroactive effect of this to give relief to those who, for many years, have been serving as secretaries and in other legislative capacities as employees here?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The bill permits the people affected by it to prove all previous service, and if they prove it, then they have to pay up to get credit for it, whatever would have been deducted if the system had been applied to them at that time. So, if they have been here 15 years they would have to pay the deduction back for 15 years if they wanted credit for that service.

Mr. LANHAM. And that would make them eligible, upon the termination of their work or upon retirement, for the annuity payments.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Assuming that a clerk or employee does not serve sufficient time to get an annuity, the gentleman stated he would get the money back with 4 percent interest.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I would like to inquire, if the gentleman knows, who pays the 4 percent, the taxpayers or does that come out of an investment fund?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Government invests the funds and guarantees 4-percent interest on it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The Government guarantees that, so it would come out of the taxpayers.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the fund does not earn 4 percent, of course, the taxpayers pay the difference.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. In the final analysis, this simply means that an employee of the legislative branch of the Government shall receive the same consideration as the employees of the executive branch of the Government, provided they pay the money necessary to bring them under the provisions of this act.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is exactly correct.

Mr. COCHRAN. In other words, if we had had this law in effect recently, one of the employees who had served here for 40 years and was separated from the service, would have been retired?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask this hypothetical question.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Assuming a clerk has been in the employ of a Member of Congress in some legislative capacity for a period of 15 years and then takes a furlough of 3 years and comes back into the service, will that individual be entitled to pay into the Government for the 15 years' service that he or she has had and obtain the benefits of this measure?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. CROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. CROWE. If a clerk to a Member has 10 years of service, is released, and goes into another branch of the Government, would this carry on?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; if they take advantage of this, they can transfer their retirement credits. If they get a job under the civil service, they can transfer their retirement credits, and the service is credited, so that when they serve a sufficient term and reach the age of retirement they can take advantage of that service.

I want to say one more word; as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] pointed out, and perhaps some did not hear it, this proposal simply gives to our own employees exactly the same privileges under the same conditions that the civil-service employees enjoy now. It does not in any way affect the right of a Member to discharge people whenever he wants to, and in no way subjects them to any requirements under the civil-service law. It permits them to take advantage of the system of retirement if they see fit to do so.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. He is not required to retire at any specified age?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; we exempt them from that.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Under the provisions of the act if a Member wanted to discharge a clerk, he has more or less of a quasi-civil-service status. Is not that true?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; that is not true.

Mr. FADDIS. He has paid his money and has a quasi-civil-service status.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is mistaken. This has nothing to do with civil service.

Mr. FADDIS. I realize that, but he has paid his money and if a Member of the House sees fit to discharge the clerk do not you think the clerk may not get sympathy from the Civil Service Commission to help him along into another job?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think that is true. This will have nothing to do with that question, because it does not affect any civil-service status. It does not affect that question at all.

Mr. FADDIS. The Civil Service is going to have sympathy with such employees, it being rotten in internal politics. It would have sympathy with the employee because he has been discharged.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion. I do not agree with him.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Is not this paid into a retirement fund administered under the Bureau of Pensions in the Department of the Interior, and has no connection whatever with civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No. That used to be true, but the retirement fund is now administered by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. When I got my refund, I got it from the Interior Department.

Mr. REED of New York. Is it not true that most secretaries of Members of Congress are more or less of a professional character? That is, they are skilled, they become expert in that line of work; and if it so happens that a Member of Congress loses out at an election, they invariably find a position with some other Member.

Mr. RAMSPECK. A great many do.

Mr. REED of New York. Would not the gentleman say a majority do?

Mr. RAMSPECK. This would help that type of secretary particularly.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman inform me about the following: Section 2 provides that a legislative employee must make up his mind within 6 months from date of this act whether he wants to take advantage of the retirement provisions; and if he does not make up his mind within 6 months that he wants to take advantage of it, he is forever barred from coming in under the Retirement Act.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct. As to those now in the service, they are given 6 months to make up their minds. If they do not want to take advantage of the system, they do not have to do it, but thereafter they cannot change their minds.

Mr. EBERHARTER. So that a year from today, if the secretary of one of the Members of Congress decides that he wants to take advantage of this provision, he could not do it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct; and I think that is a proper provision, because we must have some system about this thing. We cannot just let employees come in one month and go out the next month and so on. That would not work.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the same rule or regulation apply to the employees in the classified service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; they have no choice whatever about it. They are put under by law.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I want a point clarified. Those who have not been paying in can come under the provisions of this act provided they pay up dues that are in arrears. Is that correct?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes. We provide that any employee may get credit for previous service by paying the deductions he would have paid if the law had been applied to him at that time.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. This is my point. Most of them have rather low salaries, and they could not possibly pay it in one lump sum, and it simply means barring them out. Could they pay that in installments out of their salary?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Commission will permit them to make monthly payments of those back deductions.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. How large would those payments be?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I could not say how they would arrange them, but in almost any reasonable way.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. My recollection is that the bill came out of the committee unanimously last year and passed the House unanimously last year, and that the bill came out of the committee again this year unanimously. It seems only just to pass this bill again this year in the House.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is entirely correct. I have never heard of any opposition in the committee, and I do not recall that there was any on the floor last year. I think it passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, may I supplement the fine presentation made by the distinguished chairman of our Civil Service Committee [Mr. RAMSPECK] regarding the retirement bill for legislative employees. As ranking majority member of that committee I just desire to make a few remarks regarding legislation that has been enacted in the past, in order to have you completely understand the subject under discussion.

In 1920 Congress passed the first Retirement Act for the executive branch of our Government, which enabled between three and four hundred thousand civil-service employees to be blanketed into the retirement fund without the contribution of one cent. Since that time every civil-service employee entitled to the benefits of the Retirement Act has paid 3½ percent of his annual salary into the retirement fund. The Government contributes about 8 percent every year to the fund. This enables the employee after having reached retirement age to secure a pension of $1,200 a year.

At the time this law was passed it appertained only to the executive branch of our Government. The bill which our committee has unanimously reported enables employees of the legislative branch of our Government, such as secretaries and clerks to Members of the House and Senate, pages, reporters, police, and others to retire after 30 years' service by paying into the retirement fund 3½ percent of their salaries from the year 1920, or beginning with any year in which they started working in the legislative branch after 1920. This bill will enable our faithful, loyal, conscientious secretaries and other workers in the legislative branch of the Government to have the same privileges enjoyed by the executive branch of the Government. It is optional in its nature. There is no mandatory feature to this bill, and it is simply righting an inadvertent wrong when Congress in 1920 failed to include the legislative workers with those of the executive departments.

Until about the year 1919 a Member of the House received a check each month in his own name with which to pay the salary of his secretary. This bill under discussion also provides that persons who worked as secretaries prior to 1919 may present affidavits vouching for the fact that they had been so employed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand that they were paid by the Congressman himself.

Mr. SIROVICH. Up to about 1919 or 1920 a Member of Congress received pay from which he paid his secretaries. I understand it was about $125 a month.

Mr. SNELL. I have been here for 22 years and I never received one dollar. I know that I never received one dollar in pay.

Mr. SIROVICH. It may be the date is incorrect, but up to about 20 years ago Members of Congress received pay which was supposed to be paid to secretaries. So we do not have a record of the secretaries to Members during that time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SIROVICH. As I have stated to the Committee, about 20 years ago the practice of issuing checks to Members of Congress with which to pay secretaries was discontinued, and since then secretaries have been paid direct. If this bill is passed by the House and Senate, and signed by the President, there are only about 10 or 12 employees of the House and Senate who have worked for a period of from 30 to 35 years. If they pay their 3½ percent for the past 17 years, they will have the privilege of immediate retirement.

The Civil Service Committee unanimously reported this bill in justice to the legislative secretaries and clerks who have worked faithfully and loyally for Members of Congress, and I sincerely hope and trust that it will pass without any objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand what the gentleman meant when he said it applied to only 10 to 12 people.

Mr. SIROVICH. There are at the present time about 10 or 12 employees in the legislative branch of the Government who have worked consecutively 30 or 35 years. These men and women have made a career of secretarial and clerical positions. If they lost their positions they would have worked for the Government 35 or 40 years and never be subject to retirement.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand yet what the gentleman meant by saying that this bill only applied to 10 or 12 people. It applies to everyone who is employed here.

Mr. SIROVICH. It applies to everyone, but it would help immediately about 10 or 12 men and women who have been working 30 or 40 years in the legislative branch of our Government.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman means if they paid the back assessment for the 17 years?

Mr. SIROVICH. If they paid the back assessment for the 17 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 349), for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service and in certain positions in the legislative branch of the Government, is hereby amended to include all other employees in the legislative branch.

SEC. 2. The provisions of such act of May 29, 1930, shall not be applicable to any employee in the legislative branch who is brought within its scope by section 1 of this act until such employee gives notice in writing to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, that he or she desires to come under the provisions of such act of May 29, 1930. Such notice must be given, in the case of any such employee in the service on the effective date of this act, within 6 months from such effective date, and in the case of any such employee entering the service after the effective date of this act, within 6 months from the date of such entrance.

SEC. 3. The provisions of section 2 of such act of May 29, 1930, and of section 204 of the Economy Act of June 30, 1932, and any Executive orders pursuant thereto, relating to automatic separation, shall not apply to any employee in the legislative branch to whom the provisions of such act are extended by this act.

SEC. 4. The term "employee in the legislative branch" where used in this act shall also include (a) officers elected by the Senate or House of Representatives who are not members of either body, (b) the legislative counsel of the Senate and the legislative counsel of the House and the employees in their respective offices, (c) the Capitol Police force, (d) the employees of the Joint Committee on Printing and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and (e) clerks to Members of the Senate, clerks to Members of the House of Representatives, clerks and employees to the several committees of the House and Senate, and all other employees.

SEC. 5. In computing annuitable service, all employment prior to July 1, 1919, as clerk to a Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in his representative capacity shall be recognized as employment in the legislative branch if and when such employment can be shown by records or secondary evidence, and in the case of applications heretofore awarded or denied such cases shall be immediately reopened and readjudicated on the above basis from the date of separation, this provision to become effective from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 6. This act shall take effect on October 1, 1937.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. O'CONNOR of New York] having resumed the chair, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2901, directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. RAMSPECK, a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3408) to amend the Civil Service Act approved January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 403), and for other purposes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and many Members of the House are interested in it. I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is no quorum present, and I withdraw the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk concluded the calling of the committees.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, we have completed during the past two Wednesdays the call of all committees. We will have the calendar on next Wednesday, beginning at the head of the committees. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bills called up by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I should like to insert a short statement in the RECORD at that point relative to one of the bills. I ask unanimous consent for that permission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICE AND TREASURY DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R.

4720, making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman from Indiana want to make a unanimous-consent request with respect to the time for general debate?

Mr. LUDLOW. Unanimous request was made yesterday for the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from New York and myself.

Mr. TABER. But that was only for yesterday.

Mr. LUDLOW. That was for the whole time of general debate.

Mr. TABER. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4720, the Post Office and Treasury Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'CONNELL].

Mr. O'CONNELL of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, on January 8 I introduced two bills, H. R. 2252 and H. R. 2253, for the construction of American dirigible airships. The bill H. R. 2252 authorizes a loan of $12,000,000 for the construction of two American-designed airships much larger than the Hindenburg, an American airship plant in which these two airships may be constructed at the same time in a period of approximately 12 months, and an Atlantic operating terminal for transoceanic commercial operations. Each airship is to be capable of weekly round trips crossing the North Atlantic.

The bill H. R. 2253 authorizes the construction of a large naval airship equipped with and capable of transporting 20 military airplanes with their crews. The airship shall have installed rapid-fire, long-range guns to cover every approach to the airship. The military equipment of airplanes and guns is estimated to cost $1,000,000. This should demonstrate the value of commercial airships that may be changed to military use in event of war.

These bills do not contemplate the appropriation of Treasury funds without recompense, nor to subsidize private business. The bill H. R. 2252 simply provides an interest-bearing loan with which to demonstrate the safety and efficiency of American-designed and constructed airships and to demonstrate a profit in commercial operations, thus inducing private capital to promote the extension of American commercial-airship service to the important trade centers of the world.

When I speak of American airships, I refer only to dirigible airships which shall be designed and constructed by American engineers, scientists, inventive genius, and expert technical organizations of highest professional talent and may include representatives of the Navy, Army, Commerce, or other departments of the Government, in accordance with section 2 of H. R. 2252.

The latest constructed German airship, the Hindenburg, made 10 round trips to America the past summer to demonstrate the practicability of trans-Atlantic airship service and perhaps, incidentally, to impress our Nation as to the superiority of German airship design and construction.

In fact, such changes were the basis of an article printed in the New York Times, January 19, 1936, in which were mentioned several modifications of the original Hindenburg design. It may be only a coincidence that these modifications appear to be of a character disclosed in an engineering report on the Respess' American airship design of December 28, 1933, of which many copies were distributed.

Within the past week I received a phone call from an Army officer of the World War, now occupying an important position in a Government bureau. This party stated he had some information concerning dirigible airships, which he wished to disclose to me. I sent a representative to see this officer, who stated he had devised some important improvements in dirigible airships and had submitted his unpatented ideas and his drawings to one of the highest ranking officers of the German Zeppelin Corporation (whose name may be disclosed at the proper time) who promised to hold his disclosures in confidence and not to use any of the disclosures without proper recompense. He now states at least four features of his plans, shown in the drawings, are incorporated in the Hindenburg. This party expresses his willingness to appear before a Congressional Committee with his drawings and to swear to the statements I have outlined, as made by him.

I make no charges against the German Zeppelin organization. The modifications that appear in the Hindenburg may have been matters of common knowledge and not patentable. It may have been a coincidence, that construction principles, advocated by American engineers and inventors, appear to be so similar to improvements the German engineers may have already had in mind to be used in the construction of the Hindenburg.

I have no personal interest in the construction or operation of any airship. I have, however, a firm belief that the airship may do much to extend our overseas trade and may be a valuable means of defense for our Nation, in event of war. Mr. Respess is an inventor of note; a southerner by birth he now resides in my district of Rhode Island, where a large enterprise founded on some of his patents has been operating for many years and has never been "in the red."

In the development of his airship upon suspension bridge principles, he has employed outstanding American structural and aerodynamic engineers. He constructed and tested a scale model of his airship and has reports of leading American engineers, detailing the many improvements of his construction over the Zeppelin type of construction. Since private capital may not be secured for airships, without an adequate demonstration of profitable operations, he has applied to Congress for an interest-bearing loan with which to make such demonstration as may attract private capital for the extension of airship construction and operations.

This is the fourth session of Congress that has been urged to recognize the American engineer through extending a committee hearing where leaders in their profession may appear to give expert testimony concerning the construction of dirigible airships.

American engineers, scientists, and inventive genius need no endorsement by me. Their superior capability is recognized throughout the world, where monuments to their efficiency are erected in the form of great bridges, modern skyscrapers, great power plants, canals, and other public works. Without the American engineer, scientist, and inventor would we today have railways, steamships, the telegraph, the telephone, the electric light, the radio, moving pictures, automobiles, airplanes, and many other things which are so important in modern life?

Here is a task for the American engineer. Give him the opportunity and he will design and construct dirigible airships far better than any other, and thus America with its ample supply of nonexplosive helium gas may again lead other nations in transportation through its airships, which in time will establish a major form of transportation.

Rear Admiral H. I. Cone, retired, when chairman of the advisory committee of the United States Shipping Board Bureau, told the Federal Aviation Commission that "the Government should build a series of airships suitable for transoceanic passenger and express service." In that way, he declared, "the United States would assume world leadership in the aircraft industry, enabling us at the same time to recapture our lost position in the field of world shipping", adding, "The United States will be left hopelessly behind unless we take steps for building airships to fill out our merchant marine."

Commander Charles E. Rosendahl, veteran dirigible expert in charge of the naval air station at Lakehurst, N. J., in a recent press report is quoted as saying, "The time has come to return some of the antiairship fire. The United States has built and operated, with at least some success, three rigid naval airships and no commercial airships whatsoever. After 1½ years' service we lost the last two—the Macon and the Akron—from causes which could have been avoided. Because full success was not attained in this meager effort that dragged over some 15 years, there are those who clamor for an entire cessation of American airship development." Saying that both American scientific men and businessmen had recommended a commercial airship program, Commander Rosendahl asked, "Can it be possible that American opinion of American scientists, engineers, and operators has slipped to such a low level that so little public support has been given to airships?"

Dr. Max Munk, a leader among American scientists, in an address at the "lighter-than-air forum", Akron, Ohio, July 25, 1935, is reported as saying American airships should be designed and constructed by American engineers and skilled labor; that the German mind and the American mind are so different that Americans can never build German airships as well as the Germans, nor could the Germans build American-designed airships as well as Americans.

Dr. William Hovgaard, a foremost designer of American naval craft and a member of the committee appointed by the Science Advisory Board, known as the Durand committee, to review and analyze the past and present situation as to the design and construction of airships, prepared an important article on Airships for Naval Service, published in the United States Naval Institute Proceedings March 1936, in which the value of the airship for "Coastal patrol—submarine detection," "Strategic scouting—the airship as an airplane carrier," and "Convoy and other services" is briefly and ably set forth.

Here is an outstanding naval and aeronautical authority who appreciates the fundamental military value of airships. Under the section "Convoy and other services" Dr. Hovgaard says, "Rear Admiral W. A. Moffett has stated before the House Committee on Naval Affairs during the World War, as far as we know, no convoy was ever attacked by a submarine when guarded by an airship."

Another member of the "airship jury" appointed to decide this country's airship future, and himself a former leading German lighter-than-air authority, Dr. Theodore Von Karman, director of the Guggenheim Graduate School of Aeronautics of the California Institute of Technology, is quoted in the Oakland, Calif., Tribune, "Expert urges United States to push on with dirigibles—America should not leave this construction to Germans."

I am advised there are many former Zeppelin engineers who are American citizens, and recognizing the high qualifications of American professional talent they urge the further construction of American airships be of American design.

The construction of a fleet of great American dirigible airships, for extending our foreign trade and to be available for national defense in the event of war, should result from the approval of bills H. R. 2252 and H. R. 2253. Strong support for these bills is already assured in both the House and Senate.

We have tried building German type airships in the United States under the direction of Zeppelin-trained engineers, and there is an influential group now urging that we build more such airships or to buy German-constructed airships for American trans-Atlantic service.

Opposed to such American construction of German-type airships, the bill H. R. 2252 provides for an organization of American professional engineers, scientists, and inventive genius, with the cooperation of American technical organizations and representatives of the United States Navy, Army, Commerce, or other departments of the Government, to design and construct American airships to be greatly improved over the present type.

Mr. Roland B. Respess, of Cranston, R. I., head of the corporation named in the bill, is an inventor of note and he has expended large sums in the employment of eminent American engineers and scientists to study dirigible airship construction and improvement. He is today one of the leading advocates of American airships, and with his connections in engineering circles he should be able to form the outstanding organization outlined in section 2 of bill H. R. 2252.

A criticism of the bill H. R. 2252 has been brought to my attention with the statement the loan of only $12,000,000 is insufficient to build two dirigible airships larger than the Hindenburg, an Atlantic operating terminal, and an airship plant as described in the bill. This cricitism is undoubtedly the result of insufficient knowledge concerning the type of construction to be employed, and is based on construction costs of Zeppelin-frame airships and of the airship docks constructed at Lakehurst, N. J., and at Sunnydale, Calif.

The difference in the actual construction cost of two Zeppelin-type airships of 8,000,000 cubic foot gas capacity constructed in America and two 8,000,000 cubic foot airships of the Respess design is estimated as not less than $3,000,000 in favor of the Respess airships; further, the new type airship docks of the Respess suspended-roof design may be constructed $3,000,000 cheaper than the same size docks of the arch-frame type, as at Lakehurst and Sunnydale.

Thus the new construction provided with a loan of $12,000,000 may require an expenditure of $18,000,000 were the older types of construction employed. In other words, for a loan of only $12,000,000 the Government is protected with improvements that may have cost $18,000,000 if constructed on the old designs; is further secured by valuable patents or patent rights, by the engineering, to date estimated to be worth several hundred thousand dollars, and all assets the corporation may subsequently acquire. The construction of the airships and airship docks would be without royalty under the patents and without profit. Thus I feel the Government is amply protected in its loan of $12,000,000.

A Member of Congress has advised he is against Government loans to private enterprise, and if airships are constructed with any Government funds, the Government should own and operate the airships. In that case it is needless for me to point out that the Government should pay a suitable patent royalty and a construction profit. We have had experience with Government-owned airships that were lost, without insurance. The bill H. R. 2252 provides that full insurance shall be carried, and if these commercial airships were damaged or lost the insurance would provide funds for replacement. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that we have not a larger audience in the House this afternoon.

Mr. HOUSTON. Shall I make a point of no quorum?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; but I wish the gentleman in particular to enjoy himself and to grant me the smile that he always wears.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take a little time during this discussion to talk about the moral climate of the Nation, to which the President referred so feelingly in a recent address. I quote from the President's remarks:

> I am justified in believing that the greatest change we have witnessed has been the change in the moral climate of America. Have we reached the goal of our vision of that 4th day of March, 1933? Have we found our happy valley?

I want, therefore, to discuss some of the conditions of the present day as they appear to me to bear on the moral climate of America. I shall discuss a little of finance, the excitement over the Supreme Court, and several other matters, but will not attempt to single out any particular condition for lengthy discussion at this time. I shall read first an excerpt from an article in a magazine of national reputation called Sphere, which brings an indictment against the President. These are not my words. They probably came from a much more thoughtful person than I, and carry much more authority than I could possibly assume in what I might say: I quote:

> There is one indictment the President will find it difficult to answer, if he can answer it, for its truth stands out where all who look may see—
> He is extravagant.

I am in accord with that.

> He is the most extravagant ruler known to recorded history.

That is probably true and may be flattering to him.

> Not even Solomon who left the people of his country impoverished could hold a candle to him. He has dipped into the stored reserves of the Nation—those reserves which were created by the sweat and blood of men and women, and he has squandered them. Nor has that contented him. He has "dipt into the future far as human eye could see" and mortgaged everything in sight. He has raided the integrity of every insurance policy in the United States. He has flung the shadow of a possible inflation, worse than a pestilence, over every hearthstone in the country. For every one person to whom he could possibly promise economic security, he deprived 10 of that security.

Nor is that all. The riches of the country are not measured solely in its precious metals, its industrial plants, its buildings, its lands, its fisheries, and its mines. There is another form of riches incomparably more desirable because, having it, all else, in the main, could be recovered and reestablished. That is the moral stamina of a people. Put a man on charity, and, if he is any good at all, a blush of shame is on his face. Make him accustomed to relief, and the blush disappears to become an itching palm that is always extended.

It may be argued that this is not fair, that the need was very great, that hunger was abroad in the land. It may even be suggested that rebellion was imminent, that safety from it must be purchased.

Let it be granted that relief had temporarily to be given. Still, the fact remains that in the face of a recovery that is now well under way, with actual shortages of labor in many, if not most, of the skilled trades, the number of the unemployed to whom Federal doles are given has not greatly diminished. One would have to be somewhat naive to accept the contention that few of this number can find employment.

There were, for instance, some millions of men making a living doing odd jobs in this country and they have been demoralized. There were a number engaged in seasonal employments, who formerly saved enough from their preferential wages to carry them over the idle weeks, or who otherwise handled that situation, but they, too, have had their independence taken from them in the name of charity.

Moreover, it is true that prodigality, in this case as in any other, attaches to itself parasites that must be nourished. Mr. Hopkins could not have kept politics out of his relief work and he did not. Mr. Wallace could not have prevented some rich corporations from garnering rich profits from the Treasury in pursuance of his farm program. Indeed, it was inevitable that loose spending from Washington set an example for comparable loose spending elsewhere, running down through the subordinate governments even into poverty-stricken households.

Talk as you will, exculpate as you may, the fact remains that the Roosevelt administration has been and still is a spendthrift.

These are not my words, but they are worthy of consideration insofar as they may be true.

The cause of humanity! During the 15 years since I have been in Congress, have we been so careless and so entirely unable to understand humanity? Whom did we allow to go hungry? The Democrats seem to claim that the first time we learned of the word "humanity" was when they and their President came into power. This reminds me of the dear minister who asked one of his lady parishioners how she liked his sermons.

She said: "They are wonderful, and so instructive! We begin to think we did not know anything about sin until you came." [Laughter.]

As I often have said, you seem to think that civilization began in 1933, on March 4. You would have the masses believe that before that date no consideration was given to humanity. Some of us remember, however, that from 1922 to 1929 we were quite happy and things were going along very smoothly. Our huge war debt was greatly reduced and the country was prosperous. But you say we did not put on any brakes at all during those days. You forget recent history, how Alabama, Nebraska, Iowa, and many other farming States fairly shrieked when the Republican Administration, through the activities of the Federal Reserve Board, did try to put on the brakes, and did try to stop the farmers from investing and speculating in land. That endeavor was met by the most vicious, the most violent speeches perhaps ever heard on the floor of the House. And how the farmers did plead for the 1921–22 tariff when they found that, after all, the war was the only thing that had saved them from ruin! The Republican Party acted promptly to save them from the ruin facing them as the result of the policies of the Wilson administration.

You should not be allowed to forget that. With further reference to the national debt, I want to remind you that during the month of January 1937—while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has been quoting you deficits from day to day—the deficit of our Government was $351,235,313; not quite a half billion dollars. In the last Congress you appropriated some $10,000,000,000; and you are now seeing, perhaps, the peak of expenditure of those authorizations.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that around 1920 things were very good?

Mr. GIFFORD. I said in the twenties. That goes up to 1929—from 1922 to 1929.

Mr. HOUSTON. That would include about the time the Teapot Dome investigation was under way?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. When Mr. Harding was in power, and those boys?

Mr. GIFFORD. Is that the gentleman's contribution and the best explanation he can offer?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will be back in a minute. I have a press conference.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Teapot Dome matter has been an alibi so long I thought it was worn out and almost forgotten by this time. If it is still fresh in your minds and that is all the argument you have, may I say that refers to only one personality in the Republican Party. That is not an indictment against the Republican Party itself.

You have already increased the debt to some thirty-five billion dollars to bring about such "moral climate" as we have. I could bring on a marvelous moral climate in my own community if I spent a proportional amount of that tremendous sum among my people, giving everybody a job and handing out largesse to the voters. I could boast temporarily of a pretty good moral climate, but when my credit was exhausted and I was faced with the necessity of making collections I would not wish to vouch for the further continuance of a satisfactory moral climate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In quoting the indebtedness which the gentleman has mentioned, how much, would the gentleman tell, has been used for relief purposes?

Mr. GIFFORD. That question the gentleman asked me the other day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I have never asked that question.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman knows I cannot give him the exact amount.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Give us the approximate figures.

Mr. GIFFORD. We appropriated $3,000,300,000 and then $4,800,000,000 for relief, but, as I stated in my remarks the other day, we should make careful investigation and learn how much money has been diverted to other purposes than real relief.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I still do not understand because the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I cannot answer the question definitely.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would the gentleman object to the amount that has been used for relief purposes?

Mr. GIFFORD. No, indeed. And I may say to the gentleman I voted for all relief measures. But I wanted the funds surrounded with some safeguards.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly about the corporate devices that have been adopted by this administration. For instance, one was adopted only last Thursday. For what purpose? The excuse given was more efficiency. Why, this method of operation is now so flagrant that it has been called a conspiracy. I have a long list of these corporate devices here in my files. The procedure generally seems to be to have the R. F. C. subscribe for capital stock in some corporation organized, perhaps, in Delaware, or acting under other State charters quite free from Government control. I here call attention to an excerpt from the Brownlow report, which is now under discussion in the Congress:

The corporate device presents factors of flexibility and business efficiency not often obtainable under the typical bureau form of organization. Corporations are generally expected to be self-supporting enterprises and to be no burden upon the Treasury, even in cases where it has subscribed to their initial capital. They usually have the right to borrow on their own obligations and to use the income derived from charges for their services for payment of their necessary expenses. Freedom from the necessity of appropriations carries with it freedom from various governmental controls and restrictions, such as Budget procedures; personnel regulations governing appointment, discharge, and compensation; and various governmental rules regarding purchase, travel, space, and property. Ordinarily they devise their own systems of accounts, and within the limits of their enabling statutes may incur obligations and settle claims.

Citizens, particularly when they participate in their ownership, are more inclined to expect businesslike procedures from corporations than from direct Government activity. Corporations have demonstrated their business efficiency in such fields as the making and collection of loans, the management of property, and the operation of transportation facilities. They can be held responsible for an entire result by the accomplishments reflected in their annual reports and balance sheets rather than by a minute scrutiny of their detailed transactions.

Mr. SACKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SACKS. How about the money that was lent to Dawes without any corporate entity being involved?

Mr. GIFFORD. That was taken up the other day and very ably answered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], and I wish he were now present to reply to the gentleman. I should like to have the gentleman refer to his remarks. The situation was probably nothing like what you apparently think it was. However, enlarge upon it all you wish. Bring up personalities and detached instances, if that is all the argument you have. I am attempting to speak only of general conditions. I am not on the trail of any personality. I am not on the trail of any Democrat, so far as personality is concerned. I have real affection, as you must believe, for every Democrat in this House. If any trail in my study of expenditures should lead to a personality, I fear I should fail in my duty and not pursue it further. My efforts lie only in the general matters of expenditure.

The other day I offered several resolutions to find out who had traveled Europe; where the authorization came from for them to travel, and the amount of money spent under such authorization. Later on, when that information has been gathered, I shall take the floor and comment on those expenditures. Government agents were sent over there to import ideas from Europe to try to make over our country. Conditions over there are not at all the same as they are here. However, I am not seeking to criticize any particular person who may have traveled to Europe.

I want to know the purpose and whether proper authorization was present. I have no one in mind in particular, but do think that these trips have been excessive in number and in certain cases wholly without justification.

Mr. SACKS. How much money was given private corporations when the Dawes loan and other loans were made, and how much for relief?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman would discuss the R. F. C., which is now your most favored and approved instrument of relief. You now applaud it, and how you have increased it. When the Republican Party organized the R. F. C., you Democrats bitterly abused it, saying it was a tool for the banks, insurance companies, and railroads. Now you have accepted it as your choicest creation and have greatly enlarged it. My criticism is, why does not the R. F. C. perform the functions expected of it? They are here constantly setting up corporations within themselves. When they lose money they do not wish it to appear as one of their own activities. They do not want it to appear that they lose on their operations as a lending agency. These corporate devices have been carried too far, and we will hear about them later on. The committee on reorganization must struggle to determine what to do with them.

Together with public officials I attended the other evening dedicatory exercises of a large school building costing nearly $300,000, during which the statement was made that the President should be thanked for a contribution of $108,000. I have attended other dedicatory exercises where even the Governor of a State as well as other prominent officials would grandly proclaim, "You should thank the President and the Democratic Party for this beautiful edifice." Think of it! A Governor of a great State. There is the politics in the situation. I sometimes think they should rather give credit to whom credit belongs, because you Democrats have always said that the Republicans have the most money and the Republicans, of course must therefore pay the most taxes. And if they pay the most taxes they ought to have the credit of paying eventually for these grants. Is it moral climate to tell these people, as in these cases, for instance, that the President and the Democratic Party have made them a grant or, as they are led to believe, a gift of these funds?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. In just a moment. I want to complete the statement first.

One hundred and eight thousand dollars given by the President and the Democratic Party! Will the recipients not have to pay it all back in taxes? In that community in Massachusetts, which has to pay not only for what it gets, but so much more in proportion! Those people who were told that they were given $108,000, will have to repay it all, and more, in Federal taxes. The poor man in such communities, under our Federal method of taxation, will pay far more than that $108,000 which they say was given to him; but the masses of the people to whom these grandiose orators speak, probably believe that it really was a gift. I fear they think the Federal Government has actually given them that money and that they will not have to pay it back.

I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply want to ask the gentleman a question and I may say that we always like to hear the gentleman speak and he is really much better natured than he sounds, I am sure. [Laughter.] I have just been explaining that the gentleman's technique sounds rather porcupiney, but he has a heart of gold. I wish to ask the gentleman if he objects to being grateful. He seems to criticize; reminding the people that this has been done for them under this administration, yet is it not true that Republican Party leaders for many years went out and chloroformed the intelligence of the people so they could not think, by reminding them that they were the party of prosperity and that they owed their prosperity to the Republican Party that used to exist.

Mr. GIFFORD. I presume the Republican Party in 1928 chloroformed North Carolina and Texas and one or two other States. Personal popularity and the building up of the individual, that is the way to chloroform them.

Thanking the gentleman for his statement about my appearance being harsh, I will share with you, by way of illustration, this story. An old lady met a little boy on the street and said, "Little boy, you should not cry like that." He said, "Cry as you damn please—that's my way." [Laughter.]

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SACKS. Would the gentleman complain if they thanked those Republicans who paid the taxes?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; my complaint is that these poor people were told they had a gift of $108,000. What a gift! They have got to pay it all back, and in my State they will have to pay much more.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me, and may I make an observation for a moment as well as ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I shall have the opportunity of revising and extending my remarks and there will be much more than you will hear now.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the gentleman in connection with the educational help of this administration that certainly those in power in national affairs during the past

4 years have at least been the instrumentality through which funds have been brought to communities that needed school buildings and better educational facilities.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have already granted that, sir; but I simply say do not tell them it is a gift that they will not have to pay for.

Mr. Chairman, my time is running along, and I did want to bring out several matters. I wish to recite something I recently read; it should interest your great President. It may sound paradoxical, but nothing chills a man's love so quickly as a woman's attempts to keep it at a permanent high temperature. [Laughter.] And I say to this great dramatist in the White House—because drama should have been his life—he should pay attention to what he said before election. He has the faculty of bringing in something new. You know what he said before election, though that does not matter now. He said before election that he would clarify the Constitution by amendment, and now, like a bombshell, he comes out the other day and is trying to keep the public mind at a high temperature all the time; and, lo and behold, it has certainly cooled in the last 3 weeks. Thank the Lord that there were no Republicans in the Texas Legislature. They acted without politics in their hearts. They were not goaded by Republican opposition, yet that legislature spoke its own conscience. I have requested my secretary, as you gentlemen probably have yours, to collect data, much comment on matters pertaining to the Supreme Court, and there certainly has been a decided coolness in the letters from many, very many, who so adored him in November 1936. No; he cannot keep this high temperature up.

The trial balloon got a little too far up. You all remember Bainbridge Colby. Do you recognize him now as a Democrat? He was once Secretary of State under a former Democratic administration. He said that it is a sad and shameful day in which we are now living. But I do not want to have to quote these gentlemen. I shall extend my own remarks, expressing somewhat carefully, I hope, my own individual opinion on this vital matter. But sometimes I want to ejaculate, and I hope it may be heard far away. Moral climate! The mayors of wealthy cities and Governors of wealthy States have come down here, hat in hand, for relief; and if they did not come here and demand their share and get all they can, they could not possibly be reelected—they would be counted as men unfit to hold public office. Then you ask me how much has been spent for relief! Of the many letters that I wrote as a Congressman to the department heads, one was sent to our friend Harry Hopkins about 4 years ago. I did not even get a reply. Those who were here then will remember that as a member of the Committee on Expenditures I talked about how the relief money was spent. We had Mr. Hopkins before us one morning for discussion; and when I started to question him every Democratic member of the committee began to heckle me and to protect him, until he was so encouraged that he said to me, "How can I discuss relief with you, who know nothing about the subject?" Yes; he was decidedly independent, yet I do not dislike him even for that.

However, I had a list of 20 cities with a tax rate running less than $20—less than 3 percent for corrective and relief purposes—and I asked him why he let those towns and cities have money, and he would not answer. That is a sample of the present moral climate. Some of my mayors ought to come here, because certain of my cities greatly need assistance, but there are plenty of others who should be ashamed to and would be, except that they know the money is going to be spent anyway, and feel that they should get their share. Then so far as these dedicatory exercises are concerned, I congratulate them for having constructed these buildings, because that money raised is going to be spent somewhere, and every section must do what it can and get as much as it can, as a practical proposition. My conscience does not feel too good about it, in having to make such a statement, but is not that the only practical answer? I think so. I cannot blame them. The moral climate forces our mayors and Governors to come here and get every dollar of that money that they can get, and it should be given to them as their proper share.

There are a great many more topics that I hoped to discuss. Perhaps one or two of you who may read my remarks will wish to pick me up on some point, but I promised to yield and not take all the time, because my colleague is very desirous of being recognized. I should otherwise be very glad to yield, but in closing I ask you, would you kindly study that subject I mentioned, namely, the creditor devices of our Government, having in mind what I have previously pointed out to you with reference to the bookkeeping of the Treasury Department.

Have you forgotten that? Have you looked that up? Was I not telling you the truth about it? But these corporate devices need study. I hope I have suggested something worthy of your attention along that line. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following:

But there is nevertheless one bright spot in this rather gloomy picture of a weakening of America's moral fiber and a willingness to let a misguided sense of temporary self-interest outweigh the lasting best interests of the Nation. It shows that millions of Americans have retained their faith in the fundamental verities, although it took a severe shock to awaken many of them who have been lulled into a sense of false security by pleasant-sounding phrases and benign promises.

I refer to that most encouraging thing of recent days—the tremendous and voluntary response of the people to the pernicious proposal to subjugate the judiciary to the Executive. I say "voluntary", since no one can describe as propaganda, inspired by special interests, the flood of letters in opposition to the President's proposal. Not form letters in any sense, they display the strong personal feelings of their writers upon this vital subject. They give evidence of serious thought and much originality of argument and expression.

The American citizen, when finally brought face to face with a really great national issue, can reach a sound decision thereon. And I may add that thus far the hundreds of letters which I have received have been, with one exception, absolutely in accord in their wholehearted expression of opposition to the President's proposal, as it affects our Supreme Court. Never have I known such complete unanimity.

The people have seen through the camouflage of fair words and the sugar coating of desirable minor improvements to the whole judicial system with which the "pill of bitterness" was surrounded.

In many instances their native intelligence led them straight to the truth even before it was disclosed by countless editors and commentators in the country's press. However, the more newspapermen, educators, lawyers, and statesmen delve into the subject, the more clearly the fundamental facts emerge—the more obvious becomes the President's efforts to accomplish an aim which is primarily personal, under the guise of desirable general reform.

It is indeed no wonder that the shafts which have been directed against his proposal from all directions have been stinging and biting.

This mighty ground swell has been no "insensate clamor", as characterized by the Attorney General. To him Senator GLASS paid his respects in no uncertain terms.

The Executive may be indifferent to the fundamentals of our American institutions and the checks and balances provided in the Constitution for the safeguarding of our democratic form of government—checks which have become personally irksome to him, but obviously the Nation is not.

The country's true patriots, regardless of political party and for once in astonishing agreement, are convinced that this present proposal is not one primarily designed to improve general conditions in the Federal judiciary. The chief provision in underlying importance is the one cleverly calculated to destroy the value of the Supreme Court as one of the integral parts of a carefully planned and balanced system of government.

If after serious study and consideration it should be found that the Court, in its proper pursuance of precedent and application of strictly legal principles, has not been truly serving the purpose intended by the framers of our institutions, the Constitution provides the remedy. Indeed, the President himself plainly asserted this to the Nation when he was seeking reelection last fall. He then told the electorate that "if necessary" these objectives could be achieved through a "clarifying amendment" to the Constitution. Possibly this is one of the reasons why the country has been so genuinely shocked by this new proposal of his, and why you and I have received so many letters from people admitting that they voted for Mr. Roosevelt last November, but emphatically stating that they would not have done so had they suspected that he would now be acting in such a manner.

If a clarifying amendment is actually needed, does the President no longer trust the large majority which reelected him to office? Does he place little confidence in the fundamental judgment of his own supporters? Of course, it has been suggested that in many State legislatures reactionary lawyers predominate. It is no argument to say that constitutional amendment is a long drawn-out process. Recent history has clearly shown that an amendment can be ratified in short order when the people believe that it is desirable and necessary. This would probably create as much interest as did the prohibition amendment. Obviously, he believes that the Congress will be more subservient to his will than would the Nation as a whole in this vital matter. Hence his attempt once more to achieve his ends by indirection and devious methods. It is, however, unfortunate for him that he preferred to employ them rather than face the situation, as he sees it, with frankness and sincerity. I have called this present method of approach "clever", but that word was not justified. It has been so crude that it has fooled nobody of intelligence and intellectual honesty.

Already any number of incontrovertible reasons have been advanced to explode the myth that additional Justices are needed, either for speed or efficiency. Indeed, the utter fallaciousness of that argument has been well established.

Permit me to read to you from an editorial appearing in the Hartford Courant—

> In his (Lincoln's) first inaugural address he said: "While it is obviously possible that a decision of the Court may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it—being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases—can be better borne than could the evils of a different practice." Contrast that with the attitude now taken by President Roosevelt who, smarting under decisions of the Supreme Court holding certain of his pet measures unconstitutional, proposes to pack the Court with judges who will see eye to eye with him. For disguise it as he may with all the arts of sophistry, that is clearly his purpose.

Can anyone honestly doubt that such is, indeed, his purpose? Certainly the Nation at large is unshakeable in that belief and I call it a most encouraging sign.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the Committee a short time on some matters that I think are of importance to the membership of this House. I shall not talk to you as Democrats or Republicans, but as citizens, because, after all, you should be as much concerned about our country as I am. I am satisfied in your several communities you all bear a splendid reputation for being careful, honest, sensible men, men who believe in keeping your promises, paying your honest debts. This is your country and mine, and whatever is helpful to you and your children in government is helpful to us Republicans and our children.

May I invite your attention for a short time to the mounting increase of taxes, of debts, and of deficits? President Roosevelt as a candidate for President in 1932 announced that these taxes are taken out of the sweat of those who toil in the shops, in the mines and factories, and on the farms and railroads, as well as others of us who are not otherwise engaged. Therefore, he declared in 1932 these mounting taxes must be reduced, and the burden on the backs of the people cut down. That was a very sound and splendid declaration.

In the last year that Mr. Hoover was in office as President we collected $1,800,000,000 in revenues and taxes, but it has jumped and jumped and jumped so that in the fiscal year of 1936 we will have received over $4,115,000,000 in revenues and taxes.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In just a moment after I have finished my statement, if you please.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimated that the amount of money that will be collected this fiscal year is $5,828,150,719, and in the new fiscal year beginning July 1, 1937, we will collect $7,293,607,197. That tax and revenue is four times the amount it was in the last year of the Hoover administration.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. Is it not a fact that the national income has practically doubled from the last year of the Hoover administration down to 1936?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No, I do not think so. But we cannot measure everything by 1932, in the depths of the depression, as to income. If this $7,000,000,000 this year were taken from the rich only, there might be some justification; but it is taken from all classes, including the poorest of our land. Everybody who eats, wears, or consumes anything pays his part of the burden of these taxes. In fact, we have reached a point in this country where at least 25 cents out of every dollar goes for government. It comes out of the wages of the toilers, the pensions of the disabled veterans, and the widows' meager income. The tax on meat is at least 25 percent. Bread and everything that is consumed bears this tremendous burden of taxes. It is the common people of America who will pay the big end of this $7,000,000,000 or more of taxes and revenues in the fiscal year beginning next July.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has the gentleman had an opportunity of surveying the report issued by Young & Utley of New York, wherein they forecast that by 1950 our cost of taxes in this country, Federal and State, will run $19,000,000,000 per annum, not including social security? That is nearly 100 percent increase over what it is today.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. Now, if this tremendous increase of taxes was taking care of the expenses of our Government it would not be so bad, but every year we see more deficits and our national debt growing by leaps and bounds. Oh, my friends on the Democratic side pass our criticism off as a matter of politics, but you would not carry on your business in this way. Your bank does not do it that way. Your merchant nor your sensible farmers do not do it that way. They could not do it and survive. It would mean bankruptcy.

Then our Democrat friends say, "Oh, well, it is an emergency." I am one of those who are willing to provide for and take care of and protect those who cannot take care of and protect themselves, but one of these days we will have to cut down on a lot of useless expenditures. We will have to restore economy and common sense in Government. We cannot go on forever increasing taxes and at the same time increasing the deficits, debts, and obligations of this Government. We cannot tax or spend ourselves into prosperity.

Our national debt, as reported, now is approximately $35,000,000,000. A distinguished Democratic Senator a short time ago said it was $40,000,000,000. Then another distinguished Democratic Senator replied, "You are too conservative. If we cast up all of the obligations of this Government it will reach $45,000,000,000." Yet we are going on day by day increasing taxes and increasing the national debt of this country. The deficit for the first half of the present fiscal year is reaching toward $2,000,000,000.

During the election my Democratic friends said, "The depression is over", but after election we have been spending most of our time extending the life of these emergency measures, not for 1 year, not for 2 years, but for 2½ and 3 years more. There might be some excuse for it if we had accomplished what we said we were going to accomplish by these tremendous expenditures and these heavy taxes, that is, restore employment in this country and bring America back to a normal condition. But have we accomplished that? The American Federation of Labor in a recent statement told us there are approximately 10,000,000 employables in industry in America out of work. Yet that does not include the great army of men who toiled on the farms but who are now out of work. Let me leave this thought with you. If you take off the Government pay rolls those now employed by the Government—I do not mean its officials and clerks—you will have more people unemployed in America today than we had in June 1933 when you Democrats passed your first great relief appropriation bill for $3,300,000,000.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. I say this just in the spirit of trying to correct the gentleman's figures, and I know he will accept it in that way: The gentleman does not mean to say that the figures of the American Federation of Labor include those persons who are on W. P. A. rolls, does he?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I did not say that. I said they did not.

Mr. HEALEY. The present figures of the American Federation of Labor are exclusive of those persons who are on W. P. A. rolls, because the American Federation of Labor does not consider that those are jobs.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman is wrong there.

Mr. HEALEY. I am simply quoting the words of the president of that organization himself in a statement made to our committee sometime last year, that they did not consider that persons on W. P. A. rolls occupied jobs.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In June and July of 1933 our Democratic friends said: "Give us $3,300,000,000 to spend as we please and by Labor Day, 1933, we will have six of these ten millions of unemployed back to work."

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield for one further observation?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Briefly, but not for a speech. I yield to my associate on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HEALEY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are as many people employed today within 3,000,000 as there were at the peak of 1929 prosperity.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman's own President, in his message of 1936, told the Congress that there were at least 5,000,000 families in America needing relief; and the average family consists of 4.3 persons, according to Mr. Hopkins. So, according to the message of the gentleman's own President, there were in 1936 more than 20,000,000 Americans needing relief; and on top of that Mr. Hopkins comes along and says: "Yes, there are 20,000,000." And we have that 20,000,000 after what? After we had appropriated $3,300,000,000; after we had appropriated $4,880,000,000; and we still have it even, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said the other day on this floor, when we add the additional $790,000,000 to carry relief to June 30, 1937, by which time we shall have spent in this country $15,330,000,000 for relief and recovery.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. For a brief question.

Mr. KITCHENS. Does the gentleman make any distinction between the old standard of living and the new standard of living which the President wishes to establish in this country?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. He was not referring to the old standard or to a new standard. So far as I am concerned I wish to God we had the standard in my section of the country now that we had a few years ago.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point for another question?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I wanted to pass to another subject, but I yield briefly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This fits in so well with what the gentleman is saying. Will the gentleman agree with me that any kind of labor that is paid for through the raising of taxes has no exchange value; and that whether we have 3,500,000 or 20,000,000 people engaged and paid from tax money there is no exchange value to this labor?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There might be some exchange value, but such a condition does not denote any real progress, and does not add any wealth to the Nation—we are taking from one pocket and putting it in the other.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If there is exchange value I hope the gentleman will at some later date show how there can be exchange value in that kind of labor.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. This is what is worrying me, Mr. Chairman: We have spent all this money, we have increased this debt, and yet the big problem of unemployment is still pressing before our country. It must be solved. I am contending, Mr. Chairman, that we have not solved the great problem of this depression. You Democrats can talk about it during the campaign, but it is not solved when you have nearly a million railroad men walking the streets and highways of this country looking for work. It is not solved when you have tens of thousands of miners looking for work they cannot find, and when you have millions of others looking for work they cannot find. It is not solved and it will not be solved until America puts back to work these unemployed people who want to work, so they can make their own living for themselves and their families without being subject to the dole. What has any family to offer its sons and daughters when the family has to depend upon the meager dole? You have not solved the problem yet until our citizens are given opportunities to support themselves.

There are some things, however, that can be done about this unemployment problem under the Constitution. One of these days you and I will have to rise up and just represent America. It is generally agreed now that there are in this country around 7,000,000 aliens. I certainly have no feeling in my heart against any alien. It is generally agreed now that there are around 3,500,000 aliens in this country in violation of the law. There are here, however, and they have either got jobs or are on relief, on the backs of the taxpayers of America.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Where did the gentleman get the figure of 3½ million aliens illegally in the United States? Is it based on anything except what he has seen in a newspaper or on a statement made by some of our colleagues?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is based on statements I have heard made before commttees and that I have heard made in general discussion on the floor, and from other sources.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Would the gentleman be interested in the proper statistics?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I have heard the gentleman give his views many times, and I thank him, but I have not the time now to go into this matter further.

Now, some people say, "Oh, that is not the right principle to follow." But let an American go to Italy, to Switzerland, to France, or to Germany and try to get a job. How do they handle the matter? They first find out if there is a German citizen, a French citizen, or an Italian citizen who can do the job. If they can, the American citizen stands aside. We do not have a lot of Americans across the sea on relief. Why, not so long ago in Paris, France, a few Americans became stranded, and it was necessary to give them relief. Inside of a week they were on a ship headed for America. It is not right to give these jobs to these aliens while we see our defenders and other citizens walking the streets of this country, as well as the sons and daughters of the veterans of this country, trying to find work. Take hold of that problem, and you will create a great big place in America for the unemployed American citizens and take a big load off the backs of our taxpayers.

We come now to the farm problem. Here we burn our pigs, destroy our hogs, plow up our wheat, corn, oats, and cotton, take 30,000,000 acres of productive land out of production and tax the miner, the railroad man, and the factory worker and everyone else to pay the farmer not to produce in America, and force millions of farm laborers and farm tenants on relief. Then what do we do? We come along with these reciprocal-trade agreements, cut down the tariff, and let in farm products—corn, wheat, oats, rye, barley, pork, and beef—from foreign countries and enough to have used these 30,000,000 acres.

There was a great deal of argument the other day in favor of these reciprocal-trade agreements. I have the highest respect for Cordell Hull. I served with him as a Member of this House; I do not think there is any finer gentleman; but Mr. Hull is against the protective tariff. I have heard him make speeches. We must protect the American laborer and the American farmer and American industry, and I think, therefore, he is the wrong man to make these agreements for America involving this most important question. How can it be argued that these reciprocal-trade agreements are good for America?

In 1934, the last year before the reciprocal-trade agreements went into operation, the balance of trade in favor of America was $478,000,000. In other words, we sent $478,000,000 worth of products across the sea more than was received in this country from foreign nations. You will admit 1934 was not as prosperous a year as 1936. In 1935 the reciprocal-trade agreements were put into force, and what happened? Our balance of trade drops from $478,000,000 to two-hundred-and-thirty-million-and-odd dollars. The balance of trade is cut in half.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in 1936 what was the balance of trade? Reduced to almost nothing—$34,000,000. And in this year, 1937, while I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, you will find our balance of trade will be wiped out. If you are going to continue to cut down this balance of trade and wipe it out entirely, how in the name of high heaven can it be said that America is being benefited by these trade agreements. You see more products coming into this country than we ship out.

Mr. Chairman, we need two things in this country. We need protection for the American farmer, worker, and industry, and we need protection on the question of immigration. My friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] is a great friend of labor, but if we continue to shorten the hours and increase pay in America, how are we going to compete with those fellows across the sea with their long hours and low wages? It cannot be done. We can protect our own workers by the tariff and immigration acts. How can the American farmer of this country compete with the peon farmer over yonder, the farmer in South and Central America, India, China, and Japan? It cannot be done. So the reciprocal-trade agreements hurt our farmers and workers.

Mr. Chairman, this great American market must be saved and protected for American workers, farmers, and industry. Let us not barter away the 90- or 92-percent home market for an imaginary 3-, 4-, 6-, or 7- or 8-percent foreign market.

One other thought. It is said that Mr. Hull made it clear to the committee it was not a matter of dollars and cents he had in mind in making the trade agreements—it was world peace. Well, commerce is business. It is not philanthropy. It is just a hard-headed business proposition. He says that it would help us keep the peace of the world.

Throughout the years every time we try to touch on the foreign immigration problem they say, "Keep your hands off." It will make Japan or some other country mad.

Mr. Chairman, foreign governments owe us $12,000,000,000 we loaned to them to save them. We sent the flower of the young manhood of America across the seas, and before we get through with that great war it will have cost America more than $100,000,000,000. Trying to do what? Trying to save these folks. Now they say, "If you will surrender your trade to us, turn over to us the big end of that great, rich American market, then we will be good and we will love you."

Mr. Chairman, we have a very serious and valid criticism to make of this administration. There has been no real effort or zeal shown in trying to collect this money from these foreign governments. It will not do to say they do not have the money.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. During the Republican administration there was a measure passed to refund the foreign debt and the interest was reduced so far below what we have to pay on the outstanding bonds that it cost the American people $6,200,000,000 even if the foreign governments were to pay every dollar they owe us. In other words, you virtually gave away $6,200,000,000 in order to strengthen the foreign securities of Wall Street financiers.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I was a Member of this House when those settlements came before it for consideration. The Congress appointed a very distinguished commission to study the question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. On that commission, I believe were two or more distinguished Democrats. One of them was the very able, splendid, and honorable Charles Crisp, of Georgia. This committee, after making a study of the matter over a long period of time, brought in a unanimous report and told the Congress, "Settle on these terms—this is all these foreign nations can pay." The agreement was made and as long as the Republicans stayed in power we made them pay. [Applause.]

Do not forget the Wilson administration turned the billions over to the foreign countries.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Did you ever stop to think that all of these countries stopped paying after Mr. Roosevelt was elected President?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has not forgotten the Hoover moratorium, has he?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; I have not forgotten that.

Mr. RANKIN. Which encouraged these foreign countries to cease their payments on these same debts. That was in 1930, before the revival of righteousness in 1932, which brought in Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; in 1930 there was a world depression; but in 1932 they were paying. It was in 1933 that they quit, and I have not heard any statement made or of any real effort to make these foreign governments pay this money. I think that France, England, and Italy, and these other nations ought to be given to understand that we do not approve their conduct in not paying this honest debt to the American people.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am in favor of an individual's paying his honest debts, and I was grieved to hear one of our friends say yesterday that one day your country and mine would repudiate its honest debts. I hope I shall never live to see that day come. I want our country to say to these other countries that they must pay their honest debts. They have the money. England announces she is going to spend $7,500,000,000 for war purposes during the next 5 years, Italy is spending tremendous sums, and France is spending tremendous sums, not only to fortify their own borders but to help fortify other nations; and yet they refuse to pay us, when our boys and our money saved them.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I cannot get into an argument with my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman does not yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Let me get through with my statement.

Mr. RANKIN. I thought the gentleman had used the 5 minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I think that you folks who are in the majority here and who have control ought to give these countries to understand that they cannot have good standing with America and Americans until they begin paying their honest debts instead of creating great armies and navies to endanger the peace of the world.

With all this threat of war, I may say to my good friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], I more and more appreciate his earnest efforts to promote world peace. Russia, Italy, Germany, France, and other countries are rattling their sabers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am sure every other Member of this House entertains my own feeling that we will be as old as Methuselah before we ever vote another dollar or send another boy across the seas to help fight their battles in view of the repudiation of their honest debts by the nations we have saved. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, of course I am in favor of foreign countries' paying their debts. I voted against the refunding bill and I was one of the men who opposed the Hoover moratorium on foreign debts.

I have not arrived at the point where I think foreign countries will not pay these debts. I am opposed to canceling a single dollar. They will either pay them or they will always owe them so far as I am concerned. I think the time will come when they will pay every dollar of them.

But I want to remind the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] that during the Republican administration, when Wall Street or the money power wanted to increase the security of their loans abroad, they trumped up this scheme to fund these foreign debts. England had already offered to pay hers in 25 years and pay the same interest we were paying on our outstanding bonds; but this would not have strengthened the security of certain big American bankers in foreign countries, so they trumped up this scheme to fund the foreign debts, extending the payments over 62 years and reducing the rate of interest so far below what we are having to pay on our outstanding bonds that it would cause a loss to the American people of $6,200,000,000 over that 62 years, even if they paid every dollar of it.

Oh, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] says that they were paying in 1932. I do not have the record before me, but I do know that during 1930 Mr. Hoover, in order to placate those same financial interests, made another movement which further encouraged them to cease payment of these debts, when he asked for his moratorium, and if I can find my reply to his telegram which he sent me at that time, I should like to insert it in the RECORD.

At that time the foreign countries were led to believe by those tactics that the American people were in no hurry to collect these debts, they were led to believe by these financial interests that had these investments in foreign countries that they were going to help them cancel them, and if they had their way, the very interests that financed the Republican campaign last year would cancel these debts, in order to strengthen their securities in foreign countries.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Did the gentleman vote for these debt-funding bills?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There was a moratorium in 1930, but back in 1932 several of the countries commenced paying. Now, according to the gentleman's own contention, we are out of the depression, and why does not his administration have them pay up. Who is having the moratorium now?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am just as much in favor of the foreign countries' paying their debts as is the gentleman from Kentucky, and I can say that I never cast a vote on this floor to take money from the American people in order to reduce that debt, nor have I encouraged them to default by a single vote I ever cast in this House.

But inasmuch as the gentleman from Kentucky voted for the debt-funding bill, which cost the American people $6,200,000,000, it comes with poor grace from him now to come here, after his own President had granted this moratorium which further encouraged these countries to cease their payments, and jump on the Democratic administration because we do not say, "You must pay." Let him and the party he represents stand by those of us who are willing to say they will pay these debts or they will always owe them, and if we take that position they will pay every debt owing us and we will collect interest on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. What are they going to pay the debts with? We have half the world's gold now, and it is a whole lot of nonsense. We will not let them bring their goods here. We do not want their goods; we can make better goods than they can. Is not this a lot of buncomb on both sides, talking about paying the debt? The gentleman and I know that they cannot do it.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, they will pay sometime, but the gentleman from Kentucky belongs to the party that raised the tariff walls, and he helped to do it, which brought about the wreck of the economic structure of the world and prevented them from paying us in goods. He said then, "You cannot trade with us." But did he say by his vote "You must pay what you owe us"? No; his party did not say that. They said that you cannot trade with us, and then turned and winked at them, and under the pressure of Wall Street brought in this refunding bill that extended the payment from 62 years at a loss of $6,200,000,000; and later on, not satisfied with that, under the same pressure the Hoover administration brought in a moratorium that further extended the time for the payment of these debts and encouraged them not to pay them at all.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MICHENER. The tariff has been mentioned. The gentleman from Mississippi has told the Members of the House here on the floor that he is one of the last genuine free traders of the country, that he is the one man in Congress today who still believes in free trade. Am I correct about that?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman heard me say that I was for tariff for revenue only. That is the old Democratic doctrine.

Mr. MICHENER. I want to see whether the gentleman has changed.

Mr. RANKIN. No; I have not changed, but I will say to the gentleman that his party has changed by going into dissolution as a result of its tariff policy and other activities that proved detrimental to the public welfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, on January 26 I addressed this honorable body upon the subject of subversive and un-American activities within our borders. I pointed out then, and I am pointing out now, that the matter that I am about further to discuss is of such importance that this House must give it some attention. As we say in the vernacular, "we cannot pass the buck." We either are going to have an investigation and find out who are the subversive agitators and influences in this country, who seek to subvert or overthrow this country, whether it is the Communist on one side, the Nazis, the Black Shirts, or the Fascists on the other. I asked you on January 26 what were you going to do about it. I even went as far as placing into the RECORD a war draft questionnaire, distributed and mailed by the German consuls in this country to German citizens and American citizens of German birth, calling upon them not only to fill out the questionnaires but to present them to the German consuls, to be ready for active service, and if they had not the financial means that the German Government would pay their transportation from the United States to Germany.

When the cry came from some fine American citizens of German blood, the consuls had the audacity and the nerve to tell those Americans that irrespective of the fact they were born in this country, nevertheless the Nazi Government wants them to fill out the questionnaire and report to the German consul in this country.

I have given you the name. I have given you the place. I even went so far as to tell this Congress that these agitators, subsidized by foreign money running into millions of dollars, are now organized in at least 14 or 15 States. I can name the leaders. I can name the States. I can almost tell you where the money is and how it gets here. I am powerless unless this Congress will give me the power to bring these un-American agitators, who seek to disturb our people in this country, before a committee. I want the power to bring before this Congress or the committee that band of un-American agitators who seek to create trouble between you and me, my State and your State, my people and your people.

There is no question that today Germany is prepared for war. She has 2,000,000 children between the ages of 12 and 16 ready to take up arms. She has an army of at least 3,000,000 people ready to take up arms. She has confiscated all the money there was in Germany, whether it belonged to Americans or to English, and she has used that money to arm herself. Germany is trying to instill fear in every German, no matter where he is, that he owes a duty to the fatherland, and this propaganda has gone too far. Uncle Sam is paying no attention to it.

We have a Fascist movement in this country today. The best illustration I can give you as my witness is photographs that I was able to obtain of secret meetings held by these subversive agitators, behind closed doors, giving these so-called Americans an oath—an oath of new allegiance under fear and threat of reprisals to their German families. Five hundred Americans behind closed doors pledge allegiance to the Nazi government that they are prepared to disregard their citizenship and are ready to go on and fight for the fatherland.

Here is a book that comes from a German (exhibit A), to which I want to call your particular attention. There is a man by the name of Fritz Kuhn. I want to call particular attention to this man to my colleagues from Michigan. Fritz Kuhn is the worst spy agitator in this country. He directly represents the German Government, for no good purposes, in this country. He is supposed to be a chemist in Ford's factory, where Mr. Ford employs a number of aliens, and a group of them are all Nazi agitators. Fritz Kuhn has been designated as the American Nazi leader to mold the opinions of all Germans in this country. Only about 4 months ago Fritz Kuhn took a leave of absence from Henry Ford's factory and took an army of some 500 Americans, dressed them up in Nazi uniforms, and took them over on a German vessel and paraded before Hitler to show what we Americans are doing in behalf of Germany; and this means preparation for war and destruction to all who get in their path. Then Mr. Fritz Kuhn, who worked for Mr. Ford, and I believe is still working for Mr. Ford, presented to Mr. Hitler a book with 5,000 signatures to show that this American group is 100 percent behind him and against their own Government; and a pledge is made in the following manner in the German language:

I am bound to Germany though pledged to America.

In other words, their real ties are with Germany even if, for the sake of convenience or for economic reasons, they were obliged to take the oath of allegiance to our Government.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it the gentleman's thought that this man to whom he has referred as being employed by Mr. Ford is employed by Mr. Ford, Mr. Ford having knowledge that the man is what the gentleman claims him to be?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman think there is any collusion between Henry Ford and Hitler?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Well, if the gentleman will see me——

Mr. MICHENER. No. The gentleman has made a very serious charge.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have made it, but I do not charge Mr. Ford personally with it.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman ought to amplify.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I could prove many things if I could only produce under subpena certain records that I know I can get.

Mr. MICHENER. Well, the gentleman should not make assertions on the floor unless he is willing to go the limit.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am making the assertion to my colleague from Michigan that Fritz Kuhn is a German agitator, disturbing the peace of America and creating serious damage, and that he is connected now, or was for a number of years, with Mr. Henry Ford, and the Ford interests knew his connection with Hitler, and Hitler knew that Fritz Kuhn was connected with Ford.

Mr. MICHENER. Then he is not connected now?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. He may be connected now. Until recently he was very well connected.

Mr. MICHENER. I shall look into that.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I wish the gentleman would, and I wish the gentleman would come to see me when he does find out and give me some information. I do not want to exaggerate my story. I show you now a picture of Mr. Fritz Kuhn. I ask the gentleman to look at it so he will recognize him when he goes there.

Mr. MICHENER. I have something to do besides running around the country looking for him.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. All right. I have shown exhibit A. Here is exhibit B, another photograph.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. The gentleman showed us a picture. Will he identify it by telling us the name of the street and the place where it was taken?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It was in New York City.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. What street address?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The address is on the photograph. I think it is Eighty-second or Eighty-fifth Street.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. There is no address on this photograph.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The activity was carried on behind closed doors.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Yes; but what is the location?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It was in New York City at Eighty-second Street and Second and Third Avenues.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman cannot get in.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I cannot get in, no; but I have here a picture taken by someone who could get in which the War Department enlarged for me.

Now, I want to show you a little of what is going on in this country. Here is a picture showing a group that is training in New York. These people are shown in uniform, and each individual has his instructions. Each man in this picture is told what he should do amongst the American people and how he should sell the idea that Hitler is the leader, or Führer, of all the world. In other words, Adolph Hitler is designated a new god. He has got a new church, and you have got to worship according to his wishes.

This third photograph is of the men about whom I spoke a moment ago, the men Fritz Kuhn took to Germany a few months ago to parade before this man Hitler when he told Hitler what a great group of American spies they have in this country and what they propose to do to every German who will not join their ranks.

What I have told you of their activities is bad enough, but they are going even further than that, they are organizing a youth movement in this country amongst Yankee children of German parentage and making them daily swear allegiance to the swastika, the flag of Germany. Here is a photograph of these young, these little children ranging from 3 to 5 years of age. This is done in four States, in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. Every Sunday morning they are dressed in uniform and required to swear allegiance to the swastika, allegiance to Hitler—Yankee children. Members of Congress, what are you doing about it, if anything?

When the Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was in session in New York in 1934, we had before us one Hugo Haas who called himself the German Youth Leader, and who told us that he was an alien, never naturalized, or even taken out his first papers, but that he was an active member of the Friends of New Germany and organized a camp under the name of Camp Wille Macht in Griggstown, N. J. At that camp the children were not all German. They had boys of Irish-American, Italian, and English extraction, there. The routine of the camp was to salute the swastika flag and even the American flag was saluted in a Nazi manner. The children were taught the Hitler philosophy of government and that Hitler was the leader not only of the German people in Germany, but all the Germans all over the world.

Mr. Chairman, here is another specimen, a photograph showing a portion of these 500 Americans parading before Hitler in Germany. This photograph comes from Germany. There is Hitler. He says to Fritz Kuhn—that is the gentleman I said worked for Mr. Ford—"You go and carry on your work in America, go on and do all the dirty work you can, raise all the racial problems you can"; and he has been carrying on. If any of you gentlemen are interested to know in what States, call me, for I have all the answers you want.

My colleague the gentleman from Michigan questions my veracity—I do not think he meant it that way; I do not want to go that far, but he doubted my word as to this Fritz Kuhn working for Ford. Here is a big photograph of Mr. Fritz Kuhn with Mr. Hitler. This man is in this country. I have check-ups and I know what is being done and I know about the deadly schemes to undermine this Government.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman stated that his colleague from Michigan doubted his word. I do not think the gentleman from Michigan exactly doubted the gentleman's word.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I did not mean it in that way.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman from Michigan was just asking a question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I thank the gentleman for calling it to my attention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to give you the "pay-off" on this problem. Congress declared war in 1917. The first camp that was created to receive our drafted boys was Camp Upton at Yaphank, Long Island, in the State of New York. We sent through that camp, Mr. Chairman, 1,500,000 American souls. More soldiers went to the front from that camp than from any other in the country. What do you think has happened? Little Fritzie got busy, Fritzie Kuhn. He got some German money—in fact, they have some German money, running probably between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000, they use for this dirty work. They bought part of Camp Yaphank, from which we sent so many American boys to save the world for democracy. They are splitting up this camp into streets and are naming the streets after all the "big men" of Germany—Hitlerstrasse (Street), Goering Street, and so on; and at this very camp every Sunday morning between 2,500 and 5,000 men dressed in Nazi uniform are drilling—right on those sacred premises. Read what the American mothers say. Do you men want to sit here and let such things go on? I do not think you do.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman believe that this doctrine can get any hold in America with our public schools, our ideals, our sentiment, our knowledge, our newspapers, and our radio? I cannot assume it. I cannot see for the life of me how it can get a start in this land. I would like to have the gentleman's versions of how it can get a start here.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am giving my version of it.

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot understand it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am not interested in Germany or what they do there; I am interested in the United States of America. What the gentleman wants to ask me is how can they do this in this country?

Mr. PIERCE. How can they get a foothold over here?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The movement has grown to over 100,000. If the gentleman will go through this book, and I am going to put some of this in the RECORD, it will show how they have organized here and how they have spread their propaganda.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, about 1934 this Congress gave the Committee on Un-American Activities the right to investigate. The resolution came out in March. We did not start working until July, and we had to quit in December. We bumped into a snag. We could not subpena some of these Nazis because they were smart. They would not appear. Unless a subpena was issued in the District of Columbia and Congress was in session they ignored it. That is what they did. So last year we passed a bill providing that no matter whether Congress is in or out of session if one does not answer a subpena he is guilty of a crime.

We have examined the Nazi camp referred to. It was composed of 500 little children, all born in this country. I may say to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] I went there myself with members of the committee on a nice Sunday morning. There was not an American flag in evidence anywhere. It was a camp built up by alien groups. There was a library of Hitler's philosophy of hate, a Nazi flag, and they were doing the goose step. Did you ever see the goose step?

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Where is that camp located?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. About 10 miles below Plainfield, N. J., a place known as Griggstown, N. J.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman the exact location?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will furnish the exact location.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman please put the exact location in the RECORD?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. In reference to the camp in New Jersey may I ask, is that camp still in existence?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It is still in existence. This is a summer camp for children.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. It is still in existence?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It is still in existence. You know how children love uniforms and how they like to march. Here are German officers drilling them and teaching them just what Hitler stands for. They are told they are Germans and their first duty is to Germany. We went into the library and there was not a book there dealing with George Washington or the American flag. It was nothing but German propaganda—a propaganda of hate and poison. In addition to this group, I can name at least a hundred more organizations of various kinds in this country which have the American flag wrapped around them, but they are nothing but subversive organizations, Fascists, and various "isms." The "isms" are practically all within these organizations.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. What is the ultimate object of all this drilling?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The ultimate object is this: Germany is preparing for war, and they are under her dictation, under the dictation of this great leader, this god; and no matter where a German is, no matter where he is born, he owes allegiance to Germany.

Mr. FOCHT. That is a different doctrine than the doctrine of the old monarchy. Hitler's doctrine is different from the doctrine of the Hohenzollerns. This picture was never taken from a photograph, if the gentleman knows anything about printing. It is a television picture.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No.

Mr. FOCHT. It is taken from the imagination.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If the gentleman is suspicious——

Mr. FOCHT. I am skeptical.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman has the right to be anything he likes to be. But this book here comes from Germany. This was printed in Hamburg. There were thousands like that printed. These pictures were printed over there and sent over here. This gives you every section where the picture was taken.

Of course, in reference to some of these pictures I could not go into a secret meeting and take pictures. They were taken from certain programs of certain meetings in this country and distributed secretly to all of these agitators in this country.

Mr. GINGERY. Does the gentleman have a small photograph of that larger picture?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. I defy any man, woman, or child—and I am prepared to stand any punishment—to question the legitimacy of any of these documents I have presented.

Mr. PIERCE. But what is the object of them?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are trying to create a turmoil within our borders. They are stirring up racial hatred, intolerance, bigotry. They are trying to draft every German in this country for war. I have war documents in my possession. The object of this, Mr. Chairman, is as I started to say at the beginning.

Mr. PIERCE. Did they not try that in the World War? How far did they get?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am presenting to the Members of the House a condition as I view it, and I believe the condition ought to be investigated by the Congress of the United States. We ought to know all about these isms in this country. We ought to know what their real purpose is. I cannot answer a lot of questions, but I see that something is wrong. I cannot walk around the streets of the Capital of the United States or any other city in the United States and see men in a foreign uniform parading up and down the street. Something should be done to stop the use of these foreign uniforms. There should be only one uniform, and that the American uniform, and all of the others should be wiped out.

There should be one uniform, and that should be the American uniform. All the others ought to be wiped out, and we ought also to find out where the money is coming from.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. It seems to me that if we want to attack this problem, it would be best to solve the problems that lie before America first.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I agree with the gentleman. I am not interested in anything but America.

Mr. PIERCE. It does not seem to me that as a country we can be in any danger from these so-called subversive movements.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have some documents that I would be ashamed to even present on the floor here, that were smuggled in by the thousands that you would not want your child or your own wife to look at. I have at least 500 exhibits, and they were smuggled in here by the thousands and millions and distributed among certain races in order to create hatred. Of course, this is the kind of argument which Sinclair Lewis ridicules in his book It Can't Happen Here.

Remember, a democracy must defend itself like every other form of government and is not permitted to commit suicide as it did in Germany.

Mr. PIERCE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to have the gentleman's judgment on how Hitler got his hold on the German people. If the gentleman can tell us that——

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I can tell the gentleman that.

Mr. PIERCE. If the gentleman can tell how he reached the German nation, then the gentleman might have some reason for trying to scare us.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is something that would not be within the jurisdiction of our investigating committee if we were permitted to investigate.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. When the gentleman refers to these isms, does he also include communism?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. All of them; yes.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think that nazi-ism is a more important issue than communism?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. More important than communism?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely; and I will tell the gentleman why. We hear the Communist every day, and we know what he is after. These meetings advocating nazi-ism are subsidized by millions of dollars being spent in this country to distribute racial propaganda of all kinds attacking all non-Aryan races and religions. However, I do not look at it from the standpoint; I look at it from the standpoint of America.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman states he has investigated nazi-ism. What has he done toward investigating communism?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will answer that question. We have only scratched the surface. Sometime in September of 1934 we served a subpena on Browder, who is their leader. I was not as much concerned about Browder as I was concerned about how they obtained their funds. When we served a subpena and asked them to produce certain books, they simply came there the next day and told us they refused to appear because the law did not compel them to do so inasmuch as the subpena was not served in the District of Columbia.

It is the duty of every Member of this body to join in this fight with me in order to save our country, which is now being infested with all sorts of subversive movements, not to the best interest of our country, and contrary to the principles of our Constitution, which subversive movements tend to bring about intolerance, hatred, bigotry, all of which threaten to disturb the principles of our democracy.

I do not think that any Member of this Congress can quarrel with this program nor should the Rules Committee hesitate in bringing in this resolution at the earliest possible moment, so that we can in the nick of time expose these subversive movements whether within or without.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] such time as he may require.

SERVING YOUTH

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill (H. J. Res. 197) into Congress asking that there be appointed a special committee of Congress composed of six Members; three Members of this House and three Members of the Senate; to make a complete study of the activities of the several Federal departments and independent Federal bureaus and agencies which are rendering service to the youth of this country. There are at present actually dozens of Federal agencies seeking, in some form, to render such service. As yet, however, we have no medium through which these services may be coordinated, and their value to the youth of this country thereby increased. We are all aware that some phases of these varied Federal programs are using large sums of Federal money; others lesser sums. I am anxious that adequate Federal aid be given where and when needed for the development of our young people, and I am at the same time tremendously concerned with having this aid administered in the most effective and efficient manner. This is not a new step for me to take, for about 15 years ago I first asked this House to give Federal aid to the States for the purpose of promoting an adequate educational program throughout the Nation. Since that time I have continued to support the principle of securing such aid. I am indeed proud of the fact that a number of the Nation-wide civic and educational organizations have expressed to me their appreciation for what I was able to do, with the help of this House, a few years ago in assisting the States keep open their schools during the greatest depression in the history of this Nation.

We all know full well that education is not simply the formal teaching of a limited, classical, traditional course. It has far greater objectives. It is preparation for an active participation in our complex industrial system—a preparation not only for actually earning one's living but of taking on one's share of the civic and social responsibility in the life of the community.

The Federal Government, through its numerous agencies, is trying to help render service to youth. Yes; there are dozens of these agencies, and each, for the most part, is working independent of the others.

Now, you will hear persons say, "Why should the Federal Government be doing this now? It never did anything like this in former depressions." True, in former depressions youth and childhood have suffered, but never before has a depression destroyed so many hopes of youth. The frontier has passed. A young man or woman can no longer make good by going west and finding gold. A new and now rapidly changing social order has produced a generation alert, keen, and hungry in many ways—yet tragically disillusioned. The spread of free popular education has given us a younger generation intent upon action, and yet, as we all know, the last half dozen years have bruised all, scarred many, and ruined some of our young people. We cannot dismiss the problem by simply saying what young people "ought to do." We must face the grim facts. Homes have been lost, schools have been wiped out, ideals have been shattered, and yet some people wonder what has happened to our young people. The very foundations have been taken from them.

I am not simply making general statements. I am not asking you to listen to platitudes or sentimental niceties. You will be interested in the cold statistics given below:

1. Total number (census figures) of persons between ages 15 and 25	17,759,479
2. Number graduating from college each year	150,556
3. Number graduating from high school (approximately)	1,000,000
4. Number now attending high schools	6,096,360
5. Number now attending colleges	1,041,860
6. Total number employed between ages 16 and 25 (as of 1930)	10,870,378
7. Total number delinquent persons between 16 and 25 (estimated)	500,000
8. Total cost of crime annually	$6,000,000,000

Add to this vast waste the loss incident to unemployment, to sickness, and to maladjustment. Then try to think of the immeasurable cost due to suffering, spiritual, mental, physical, and social, which these young people have suffered and you will begin to realize the tragic vastness of the problem.

The schools of the Nation have been particularly hard pressed. Everyone in this House has heard the facts from social-minded persons of his State. You certainly realize that thousands of schools have been closed, and school terms unduly shortened. In many communities you find delapidated, unheated, poorly lighted, and improperly ventilated school buildings. Teachers are inadequately paid, and often courses of study are limited by lack of funds. Playgrounds and libraries are inadequate. In these overcrowded and poorly conditioned school buildings the very large classes really made education a mass-production industry.

There is hardly a State in the Union that has not had to face these facts, dramatically yet tragically. The rural areas, of course, have suffered the most. The suffering local community cannot help itself because far too many of them simply have not the funds with which to carry on the school program. We all know the reason. The school resources of the local community are derived largely from taxation on real property, and this is a very limited source. Other possible assets are taxed by the Federal and State Governments. It is needless to go into these facts of local financing at this point. We all know them; know them too well.

In the face of these figures no one can deny the enormity of the problem, nor can we deny that it must be a matter of concern to the governments of this Nation, local, State, and Federal.

The States have turned to the Federal Government for aid, but this is not surprising. They argue that Federal aid for agriculture, for industry, for banking, is now available. Our Government has not been overthrown, nor have our ideals been shattered because the Federal Government has aided agriculture, industry, and banking. On the contrary, our faith in government and particularly in our form of government, has been aided thereby. We know the better, for ours is a government for the people, not for just a few of them, but for all the people.

Yet some may ask, Why should the Federal Government help the States carry on a program for youth? My answer is to develop good citizens of their children and their youth. Frankly, I believe this is a concern for the Federal Government for the reasons given below:

First. Each of these young people is a citizen—a potential voter of these United States—no matter where he lives.

Second. Crime, illiteracy, and maladjustment know no State lines. The social misfit of one State is the problem of all States, for the citizen migrates; the more so, if he is maladjusted.

I hold that in this problem "a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved." I quote from a decision of the United States Supreme Court, viz.:

State of Missouri v. Holland, United States Game Warden (252 U. S. 416, 1920), which is the case in which the United States Supreme Court upheld the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of July 3, 1918.

Under this act the United States sought to protect its migratory birds. In giving the opinion for the Court sustaining the law, Justice Holmes said:

> Here a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved. It can be protected only by national action * * *. We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forests and our crops are destroyed. It is not sufficient to rely upon the States. The reliance is in vain, and were it otherwise, the question is whether the United States is forbidden to act. We are of the opinion that the treaty and statute must be upheld.

We do not admit that the safekeeping of our Nation's migratory birds is of greater concern to us than the safekeeping of our Nation's boys and girls. In fact, during the last few years we have begun to recognize that the training of the youth in every part of our country—yes, training in its broadest sense—is of the greatest interest to all of us. Some of the activities of the Federal Government operating in the interest of youth, have been of great social significance. I would call your attention to a few of these.

THE NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

This agency has done a fine job. Mind you, I am very well aware of possible errors in the administration of this work here and there. In some instances, I know of poor personnel, of superficial projects, and of statements that false benefits have been claimed in some places. Happily, I know too that the administrators of this work are facing these problems very frankly. I wish to pause here and pay tribute to these consecrated men and women, who are devoting their time and efforts in order to direct this all-important work. First, I refer to those who have served in an advisory capacity under Charles Taussig of New York. As a businessman he realized that our Nation's greatest investment lay in its youth and he and his committee wanted that investment developed. A Nation's sincere thanks is due him and his committee. Then I would pay great tribute to Miss Josephine Roche, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

As chairman of the executive committee of the N. Y. A., Miss Roche is doing a fine piece of constructive human engineering, which is typical of her life of self-sacrifice. Especially would I commend Richard R. Brown, who has been directly responsible for the execution of this splendid youth program. Time will not permit a tribute to others by name, but there is one lady whose sincere warm-hearted consecrated work in behalf of the poor and the unfortunate, old and young, commands our respect; she, who without official connection with the N. Y. A. has shown the greatest interest in the well-being of young people affected by the N. Y. A. by visiting projects wherever possible, by attending State meetings and enthusiastically writing about them, by conferring continually with those interested. I refer to our first lady, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt. May her interest in essentially human problems continue to inspire many men and women.

Errors, mistakes, blunders in the N. Y. A. in a number of places are granted, but who among us will say that all schools should be wiped out because, in many places, their administration has been characterized by errors, mistakes, and blunders, or even that the "bad schools should be wiped out." Of course not! Wipe out the errors, but save the institution.

Because I know of the tremendous value of the N. Y. A., I want it preserved in some form. I know of the good to the college youth of my State through the student-aid fund. I know of the significant guidance work undertaken by it; of the broadly conceived recreational program; of the recognition in general of a learning-by-doing program, educationally sound and socially inspiring.

It is such a broad program, based upon sound educational principles, that I want to speak of it in a little more detail here.

The National Youth Administration was created by Executive order on June 26, 1935, as a division of the Works Progress Administration. The major objectives of the National Youth Administration were then announced:

One. To provide funds for the part-time employment of needy school, college, and graduate students between 16 and 25 years of age, so that they can continue their education.

Two. To provide funds for the part-time employment on work projects of young persons, chiefly from relief families, between 18 and 25 years of age—the projects being designed not only to give these young people valuable work experience, but to benefit youth generally and the communities in which they live.

The National Youth Administration has not used its appropriation to set up separate facilities to carry on its work, but has cooperated, insofar as possible, with existing institutions and agencies. Fortunately, too, the national organization is small, most of its interesting and beneficial work is being carried on through State organizations and through State and local advisory committees, of which there are over 2,000, with a total membership of about 25,000, who serve without compensation.

One of the most significant parts of this youth service is the program of student aid. During the first year of operation, the National Youth Administration reached approximately 600,000 young people. In the student-aid program during the month of April 1936, a total of 404,732 secondary schools, colleges, and graduate students were employed. Of this total number, 275,337 were secondary school students, earning an average wage of $5.45 for the month; 122,675 were undergraduate college students earning an average of $12.69 for the month, and 6,720 were graduate students earning an average of $19.25 for the month. The majority of eligible schools, colleges, and graduate schools in the United States participated in the program and in the same month of April 1936, this number comprised 17,999 secondary schools, 1,593 colleges, and 224 graduate schools. The student-aid program has now been extended to Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska. One cannot begin to measure the tremendous value of even this small amount of aid to these young people. It has helped keep them alive spiritually and physically.

The second objective of the National Youth Administration is giving part-time employment on work projects to young persons between 18 and 25 years of age, chiefly from relief families, was started in January 1936. The employment of youths on work projects increased rapidly after the first month. The highest number reported employed was 182,477 in June 1936.

The work performed by these youths covered a wide range of activities, which are broadly classified as follows: Recreation and youth community service, land development, training in public service, building construction and renovation, sewing, manual crafts, library service, domestic science, and agriculture. A recent analysis of approved work projects showed that approximately 24 percent, or 43,497, of the total of 180,703 youths assigned to projects were to work on recreation and youth community-service projects. Of the number employed on projects of this type, a minority was engaged in direct leadership service to the community. The majority assisted adult leaders in various ways—qualified, responsible youths only being used for leadership. Under the recreational program are included many projects for the landscaping and beautification of school properties, and playground construction. This type of project is carried on where public-school finances have not permitted the landscaping and construction of play areas around schoolhouses. This work includes laying out baseball fields, running tracks, tennis courts, playgrounds, and other areas for sports, and constructing and repairing playground equipment. The National Youth Administration has assigned youths to crowded urban center playgrounds to keep them open longer, thus permitting more children to use them.

Through the assistance of National Youth Administration, the facilities of such agencies as settlement houses, and other established youth organizations, have been expanded and extended to serve a greater number of young people. In cases where the recreational facilities of a community are limited, the National Youth Administration has organized community "youth centers" to include vocations and hobbies as well as physical recreation. Youth centers not only tie in very closely with recreational supervision and leadership, but also serve as a means of giving vocational guidance, employment, and occupational information. Classes are organized and carried on in these centers and avocational interests are encouraged. In several instances National Youth Administration workers have completely built the "center", thereby learning carpentry, masonry, plumbing, and so forth, in the process. In other instances National Youth Administration workers have remodeled available public buildings as youth centers. Youths employed in these centers receive training in manual and clerical skills and recreational leadership. Benefits to young persons using the centers arises from the use of facilities for recreation and training.

The development of adequate recreational work in every community is of far greater importance than we recognize at first glance. The annual cost of crime in this country is fifteen billions, and more than 30 percent of all crimes are committed by persons under 25 years of age—this is the age the N. Y. A. is trying to serve and help direct toward the right ideals of life. Crime, we know, is social disease. Today we are interested not only in curing existing diseases, but in preventing disease. A sound, well-planned recreational program is one phase of crime preventive. Employment information has been given and educational classes conducted in these "centers."

About 14 percent, or 26,189, were assigned to public-service projects which involved work in governmental and public institutional offices, which made possible the training of these youths in a wide range of clerical work, as well as acquainting them with the operation of governmental and public services. The local student-aid program must be so administered as to be helpful to the student and to the community. There is a growing development of truly valuable work projects to be used by high schools and colleges. There must be in every community opportunity for aid for students who are interested in an academic course. Something also is available for the high-school graduate who cannot go to college.

The average estimated turn-over of youths employed on National Youth Administration work projects has been about 10 percent every 5 weeks, so that up to the present time more than 100,000 youths have passed through the works program to school, private employment, or some other more permanent relationship. It is significant that youth is not staying on indefinitely on National Youth Administration projects. The works program of the National Youth Administration has helped, and is helping, youth to obtain necessary work experience and brings it in touch with work opportunities in private employment.

This brings me to my next point—the vocational guidance work of the N. Y. A. We must recognize as a Nation that training in the humanities is not the only form of educational training; that adjustment in our complex industrial society is education in its truest sense. There should be in every community an extremely practical and educationally sound guidance program.

Vocational guidance is recognized by all educational authorities as an essential service to youth in the present complexity of society, but it has been made available in only a limited number of the larger and more progressive schools. For those who have left school, especially those large numbers who drop out before graduation from a secondary school, there is practically nothing. The National Youth Administration has attempted to meet this need through its vocational guidance and placement service, making such service available to those thousands of youths who have passed beyond the classroom and have come to grips with the problem of making a living.

Some activity of this sort is in evidence in nearly every State now, the program being shaped to the needs peculiar to the various communities. Usually, the work consists of furnishing occupational information about the various fields of work which are open to the youth of the community, giving an outline of the training requirement, the pay, and promotional possibilities, and the relative availability of jobs. This is done sometimes through classes for out-of-school youths which meet in school buildings, churches, community centers, or the quarters of various social agencies. It is done sometimes through the preparation of pamphlets which are given wide distribution among young people and agencies serving them. In a few cities, where technical assistance can be obtained from cooperating sponsors, individual guidance bureaus have been set up where the young job seekers' talents and preferences are analyzed and information is given them about possible lines of employment and training. Through these efforts thousands of young people are being advised about vocations for which they are intellectually and temperamentally suited and a corresponding number of future misfits averted.

Job counseling is a fruitless effort, however, if there are no jobs for the counseled to fill. Accordingly, a service of equal importance—a junior placement service—has been established to parallel the work in vocational guidance.

Under this program junior placement counselors, paid by the N. Y. A., have been placed on the staffs of public employment offices in 42 cities in 18 States about the country. Their function is to receive the applications of job seekers between 16 and 25 years of age, whether connected with N. Y. A. or not, to gage their experience and abilities, and to search out the jobs for which they are fitted. These junior placement offices have been in operation for varying periods of 2 to 8 months and the resulting figures show at the end of October the following:

Forty-seven thousand four hundred and eighty-five different young people have been registered; 14,730 have been placed at jobs in private industry; 12,582 employers have been personally visited and solicited for jobs.

All vocational training, be it in the skilled trades, plant training, agricultural training, or training in domestic science must be planned and conducted in the interest of the student, to help him effect his adjustment in our present-day complex society and, at no time, to help make possible exploitation of our young people by unscrupulous and greedy employers. I have always been deeply interested in the program of the Federal Government in vocational education. I am now particularly interested in the study being made by Dr. Reeves of the vocational committee. He has done a number of fine things, and I look for this study to add to his laurels.

THE DIVISION OF EDUCATIONAL CAMPS

For the year 1936–37 the Division of Educational Camps of the National Youth Administration was created. Fifty camps are expected to be established at a total cost not to exceed $1,166,000. The average expenditure for each camp will be $3,330 a month during the period of operation.

The purpose of these resident undertakings is not only to reestablish the morale of girls who have grown to young womanhood in a period of family and community dejection, but to teach them by practice and experience the responsibilities of living in a democracy. In the course of living together they come to respect the rights of others and through representative student government and concern for the behavior of the camp as a whole, they develop a sense of responsibility which can later be directed to their personal lives and their home communities. On return home the girls are assisted in obtaining employment either on Youth Administration projects or in private industry through the public employment office.

The 1936–37 undertaking is a part of the work-project program. In every camp the girls are engaged in useful employment, in addition to camp maintenance, and earn their subsistence and $5 in cash each month.

The work, whether it is the making of hospital supplies, recreation equipment, or labor in tree nurseries, becomes part of the educational program and is discussed in terms of material and human conservation. The camps are to be open throughout the year with camp terms of 3 or 4 months for each girl. This is accomplished by using camps or school buildings, which can be had at a nominal rent, and by securing a number of staff members, who are already engaged on a work project, and can be transferred to this undertaking. The cost is also kept low because a large number of girls, from eighty to a hundred, is in attendance at each camp.

On January 1, 1937, 18 camps had been authorized in 15 States, which are rapidly being placed into operation. Requests which have come from the State youth directors thus far will soon complete the quota of 50 camps for this year's program. The establishment of a camp in each instance is a response to popular sentiment in the community. The camp program will bring work, recreation, education, and new opportunities in their communities to approximately 5,000 young women during this year.

THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION

(Department of the Interior)

Since 1869 the Office of Education has served as the Nation's clearing house on information on all phases of education. Through many and varied forms of research, through surveys, through conferences, data are gathered. Then the statisticians and other statistical interpreters compile and analyze these data. Information is gathered on teaching methods, courses of study, school administration, textbooks, teacher training, school finance, city and rural school systems, school-building programs, playgrounds, material on all problems of all levels of formal schooling. Recent reports and lengthy studies on any of these topics are now available in the several hundred currently issued statements and pamphlets of the office.

What else should the Office of Education do? How can these studies be used to the greatest advantage by the greatest number?

In addition to its fact-finding, information-defining functions, the "regular" functions of the United States Office of Education include the administration of Federal funds for certain special educational activities such as land-grant colleges, vocational education, and vocational rehabilitation.

The duties of the Office of Education have been greatly increased in the last few years. The Emergency Education program in all its aspects has demanded much time of the Office of Education. Its complex far-reaching program demands our attention.

In C. C. C. camps training is now being given to young men under the direct supervision of the Office of Education. The helpful training given these young men in camps has provoked favorable comment from all parts of our country. In their evening schools, more than 300,000 youths are now receiving vocational adjustment. Surely we must seriously consider the advisability of coordinating work with a more permanent National Youth Service.

In vocational schools throughout the Nation the Office of Education is now training 1,381,701 youths. Of this number 347,728 are receiving guidance in agriculture, 579,971 in trade and industry, and 454,002 in home economics. During the year 1936 the Federal Government expended for this purpose a total of $9,748,925, while State and local Governments expended the sum of $23,678,909. It will be of special interest to know that 109,374 young farmers received training in evening classes, and 120,000 young men, known as future farmers of America, are likewise participating in this program.

Again, in a program of vocational rehabilitation for disabled youths, approximately 10,338 unfortunate youths are being rehabilitated and given a new grasp on life.

THE FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATION

This facility of the Federal Government during the year 1934 made emergency grants to the rural schools in the sum of $14,500,000, and in 1935 the amount made available for the same purpose was $7,500,000. At the present time, the adult education program of the W. P. A. is training in evening schools approximately 12,000,000 youths.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

Let me briefly direct your attention to another service for youth which our Government is now rendering. I refer to the aid to dependent children under the Social Security Act. We realize more and more that the well-being of a child depends largely on his having an opportunity to grow up in wholesome happy family surroundings. As I said before, we know that the family, as the social unit of our society, must be the basis of our planning for the well-being of the child. Thousands of children are in families that have lost their breadwinner. These children were given consideration under the Social Security Act.

The purpose of aid to dependent children under the Social Security Act is to help the States provide cash allowances for the support of such children in their own homes. It is one of three assistance provisions administered by the Bureau of Public Assistance of the Social Security Board.

Long experience has proved that keeping the family together is the best way of caring for children who have lost the support of their natural breadwinner, best for society, because home care is more economical than other kinds of maintenance, and because it helps to forestall the possible costs of later dependency and delinquency; best for the parent or other relative because, even where the payment is small, it is regular and assured; and best for the child, because wholesome family life can do more than anything else to safeguard his health, happiness, and character.

According to the best estimates available, there are in this country at least 1,000,000 such dependent children. In the 27 States with plans approved under the Social Security Act, about 314,000 of these children are now being aided with Federal cooperation. This represents a very substantial increase over the numbers aided in the same States before Federal assistance became available; and before the end of 1937 it is authoritatively stated that a further increase is expected. With many State legislatures now meeting or soon to meet, it is expected that a number of States which have not yet had an opportunity to do so will take the steps necessary for participation in this program.

Federal cooperation in aid to dependent children is the natural outgrowth of a quarter century of State and local experience with mothers' aid. The first State mothers' aid law was passed in 1911, and today only two States make no such provision, but in many parts of the country it has become increasingly difficult to finance these laws. During recent years many State and local provisions have been drastically curtailed or even suspended. In the years just preceding the passage of the act, in 1935, three times as many dependent children were receiving assistance from the Federal Government through its emergency relief program as under State and local mothers' aid laws. The Federal Government thus came into the picture in answer to an urgent need. All that the Social Security Act does is to develop an organized plan of State-Federal cooperation in order to help the States fulfill an obligation to which they have long been committed, but which many of them have found hard to support.

The same general scheme of cooperation is followed here as in other sections of the act; plans are State initiated and State administered, with Federal cooperation and financial assistance.

The requirements, to which a State plan must conform for approval, are based on what the earlier State experience had shown to be essential for effective administration: The State itself must bear part of the cost; the plan must cover the entire State and be administered or supervised by a State agency; it must assure the right to a fair hearing before this agency to those whose applications are denied; and it must conform to the Act as to certain requirements regarding residence and in some other respects. Within these broad outlines State plans vary considerably to meet local conditions and needs. To States with plans approved by the Social Security Board, the Federal Government makes grants equal to one-third of the State's total expenditures, up to $18 for the first child and $12 for each additional child in the same home. This maximum in no way limits the State, which may make its individual payments either higher or lower. Federal grants for this form of assistance total $11,882,440 for the entire period since funds first became available in February.

These new plans, set up in conformity to the Act, help the States provide for more children by making more money available and by providing a wider coverage. It is particularly noteworthy that, although it is not necessary for approval, nearly all the participating States have made their provisions coextensive with the liberal outside limits established by the Act. Fewer homes are being broken up by poverty and more and more children will be assured of their birthright of a wholesome childhood as part of a normal family. Here is a service to youth which is of great social value.

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE AND CHILDREN'S BUREAU OF LABOR DEPARTMENT

Among the services to youth, which are of great importance, are those seeking to promote the health and physical well-being of the young people. The general community health programs, conducted by the United States Public Health Service in cooperation with the State health officers, are certain to prove a splendid investment—in time. A health program more immediately affecting youth, more definitely only for youth in extending and developing more adequate local services for the health and protection of children and youth, is the health work of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. To its functions as a clearing house of information concerning the extent of juvenile need and tried methods of care and prevention has been added responsibility for three types of grants-in-aid to the States under the social security program. These include assistance for maternal and child-health services, services for children who are crippled or suffering from conditions which lead to crippling, and protective services for dependent, neglected, and delinquent children, chiefly those living in rural areas. These three types of aid were designed especially for children in isolated or needy areas or parts of the country not before reached to any extent by public-health or child-protective work.

Together with the aid to needy dependent children administered by the Social Security Board, they make it possible for States and communities to plan more adequately than ever before to meet their responsibilities to children and youth and to determine on the basis of experience in what ways the facilities afforded need to be further extended and enlarged. To be sure we are still but trying to find the best possible way to administer this program locally. I am anxious to help them evolve the best way. The amounts appropriated by Congress, a large part of which must be matched by State and local funds, are allotted to State agencies of health and welfare or agencies giving service to crippled children, and paid to States having approved plans meeting the conditions prescribed in the Social Security Act. All the States, Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia are cooperating in the maternal and child-health work; 43 States and Territories so far in services to crippled children; and 42 States and the District of Columbia so far in child-welfare services. In a few States legislative action is needed to enable State agencies to cooperate in all three programs.

Since the first appropriations became available in February 1936, marked progress has been made in the establishment of divisions of maternal and child health in State health department, and the development of local services by local health units with the assistance and cooperation of local physicians.

Public-health nursing service in the States and in local governmental units is being extended by aid through the Children's Bureau for the maternal and child-health program, and the United States Public Health Service for general public-health work. The State plans naturally vary in content and provisions for administration. Many of them include such activities as nutrition work for children, dental-hygene work, and lecture courses in medical treatment of maternity and childhood by recognized medical authorities for physicians in active practice, arranged in cooperation with State and local medical societies. Under the act the plans submitted by the States must provide for cooperation with medical, health, nursing, and welfare groups.

The work being developed for crippled children includes diagnostic services, hospitalization, convalescent care, and follow-up care. We are told that many children have been brought under treatment who would otherwise have had to go through life seriously handicapped by conditions that may be partly or wholly remedied.

Plans for child-welfare services have emphasized the need for a local unit of welfare administration, which would include child welfare and general public-welfare service. The importance of coordinating child-welfare services with maternal and child-health services and services for crippled children has also been recognized. Further need for local cooperation is also felt.

Thus we see the Federal Government and the States as partners in a program which recognizes youth as a national asset and which, therefore, seeks to reduce maternal and infant mortality, to promote child health and welfare, and to prevent and deal with physical, mental, and social handicaps, and with juvenile delinquency.

The groundwork has been laid for effective cooperation. State and local action, based on a knowledge of State and local conditions, coupled with our genuine desire to aid our young people to the fullest extent possible, will help develop an adequate program which we trust will mean real benefits for the mothers and children of the United States.

Again I point out to this House that this is but one of dozens of extremely valuable governmental services for youth.

At the outset of this address I called the attention of this House to the fact that dozens of Federal agencies are now in some way serving youth. I firmly believe in federally aided services for youth; but quite as firmly I believe they should be coordinated. The question of a youth service is of vast importance to this country, socially and financially. We must, I feel, pause and give careful consideration to our program for the future. We must have a careful study made.

I have, therefore, introduced a bill calling upon Congress to authorize the appointment of a special committee to make a thorough study of this subject. In approaching this problem, I have given myself a half a dozen questions to consider—questions which the study proposed in my bill must consider:

First. Why and what should the Federal Government's concern for the welfare of youth?

Second. How is this interest at present manifested? In permanent establishments? In an emergency unit?

Third. What relationship exists among the several Federal agencies now serving youth? Are their functions coordinated? Does their work overlap? Is there administrative waste?

Fourth. What relationship does and what relationship should exist between the Federal Government, the several State governments, and local governments in administering such a program?

Fifth. How should this interest be manifested in a more lasting structure?

Sixth. My last question is not concerned with governmental activity. But to me it is very important: What part can a civic, religious, or quasi-religious, an educational, or any industrial group play in developing and promoting a program in the interest of youth, in cooperation with the Government's agencies.

It seems to me that it is necessary for us first of all to formulate clearly our future objectives, our goal, as it were, for a youth service and then to plan carefully, step by step, a program through which the goal may be reached. Our youth service cannot, like Minerva, spring from the head of Jupiter, fully armed; nor is it necessary that it should, like Topsy, "just grow." It should grow, but through a well thought out plan.

The program of action should be developed and it should be based not only upon fine abstract educational and social principles, adopted by national and State groups, but more particularly upon those principles as they are revealed, in all their aspects, in actual practice in each community.

Then, too, we should most carefully direct our consideration to definite questions which arise in connection with such a program for aid; first, from a point of view of good government in a Federal democracy, composed of sovereign States, is Federal aid desirable for youth services? If so, when, where, and how much?

Practically all in this House are agreed that we must maintain local and State autonomy in administering such services. Sound social and political theory would demand this. Whether there should be certain Federal minimum standards for the State in administering the Federal funds is a moot question. Personally, I believe we must be practical. The Federal Government will, in handing out money, check up on how that money is being spent. I believe it is safer and better that there should be written into the law exactly what the Federal Government may and must audit. Many serious questions must be considered and thoughtfully answered.

While the study which I propose in my resolution is going on let us continue the experimental activities of the N. Y. A., of the C. C. C., of these other fine new agencies. Then let us make the program permanent.

We must determine, after careful study, the best possible means of coordinating the many agencies serving youth, of effecting an efficient, educationally sound relationship between the Federal Government and the States, of developing the best possible technique of handling these agencies through which we hope actually to equalize educational opportunities.

I hope that the religious, quasi-religious, civic, and educational groups in every community will study these broad educational and civic questions. School questions, even educational methods, should have the study of the whole community. While everyone realizes full well that the making of school curricula and the development of a technique in teaching is the highly technical job of the professionally trained person, yet no one will deny the great value of having the community fully informed on the objectives and methods of present-day education to the end that the methods and the objectives are better understood. A democratic policy of administration, which is an essential part of democratic government, may be obtained as a result of public study and cooperation.

Through a study of a community's laws and problems by the community itself, and problems by the community itself, and with aid but without control from the Federal Government, I hope we may evolve a socially planned youth-service program in every community through which a community consciousness may be developed; a consciousness truly spiritual, broadly patriotic, and expressed practically and essentially as a part of each citizen, in his own way, for the common good.

With this as my objective, I have introduced a bill through which I hope there may in time be given to this country a coordinated youth service, locally adjusted, State administered, and federally aided.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

THE PHILIPPINE COMMONWEALTH AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, December 10, 1898, the Treaty of Paris was signed. Its purpose was to end the Spanish-American War, undertaken in the name of liberty. The terms of this treaty placed the Islands of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Archipelago under the jurisdiction of the United States and under the authority of Congress. When the United States declared war against Spain, and as a result of the execution of the war and the ratification of the Treaty of Paris, the United States assumed a new position in international affairs. We stepped westward into Asiatic territory, a distance of more than 7,160 miles as the crow flies, from our Pacific coast, or 10,000 miles from Washington, D. C., paid Spain $20,000,000 for her outlays, and associated ourselves with the economic, social, and political problems of the Philippine Islands. We became sponsor for the independence of Cuba, and since then have very materially guaranteed law and order in that island. In due course the people of Puerto Rico became citizens of the United States, and they now ask for their independence. More than all of this, through our intervening steps having to do with these islands, we departed from our traditional policy of isolation and became involved in European affairs.

With the assumption of responsibilities there follows the obligation of duties. Upon the signing of the Paris Treaty and its ratification, Congress became duty bound to establish civil government, promote the welfare of the inhabitants, and, in due course, take the necessary action giving to the people of these islands a permanent political status. Long ago Congress discharged these duties insofar as Cuba is concerned. March 24, 1934, President Roosevelt approved the Philippine Independence Act, but not until July 4, 1946, is the United States to withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty then existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippine Islands. Now let us look at the Philippine problem for a few minutes.

ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS WITH UNITED STATES PENDING COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

There are seven major commodities in Philippine export trade, and, named in their importance, we find them to be sugar, coconut products, hemp and hemp products, gold—treated here as a commodity—tobacco and products, embroideries, timber and lumber. In giving thought to the relations under consideration, these seven products and their place in the economic structure of the United States should be kept in mind. Around them will revolve debate and legislative action.

Section 6, subsections (a), (b), and (c) of the independence act specifically provide duty-free quotas on sugar, raw and refined; coconut oil; and hemp products that may be shipped—exported—to the United States during the first 5 years after the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands—November 15, 1935. These are the only limitations and exceptions of this nature made to the duty-free status of goods as of the date of the approval of the act.

Section 6 (e) of the act makes this most interesting and important exception:

The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall impose and collect an export tax on all articles that may be exported to the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of existing law as modified by the foregoing provisions of this section, including the articles enumerated in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c), within the limitations therein specified.

The act then provides for 5 percent of the rates of duty during the sixth year, 10 percent during the seventh year, 15 percent during the eighth year, 20 percent during the ninth year, and—

After the expiration of the ninth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 25 per centum of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

Section 6, subsection (5) provided:

The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall place all funds received from such export taxes in a sinking fund, and such funds shall, in addition to other moneys available for that purpose, be applied solely to the payment of the principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities, until such indebtedness has been fully discharged.

TARIFF DUTIES AFTER INDEPENDENCE

Section 13 of the act provides that—

After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries: Provided, That at least 1 year prior to the date fixed in this act for the independence of the Philippine Islands, there shall be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, such representatives to be appointed by the President of the United States and the Chief Executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, respectively, for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States; but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS URGING PASSAGE OF THE PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE ACT

The President, in his message to Congress March 2, 1934, urging the passage of the independence act, among other things said:

* * * Where imperfections or inequalities exist, I am confident that they can be corrected after proper hearing and in fairness to both people. * * * May I emphasize that while we desire to grant complete independence at the earliest proper moment, to effect this result without allowing sufficient time for necessary political and economic adjustments would be a definite injustice to the people of the Philippine Islands themselves little short of a denial of independence itself.

April 4, 1935, I pressed Hon. Manuel Quezon for his interpretation of the meaning of the President's statement and whether it applied to "imperfections or inequalities" existing against the Philippines only or to both the islands and the United States. Page 76 of the hearings on House bill 6653, setting forth Mr. Quezon's testimony, would indicate he feels reference was made only to imperfections and inequalities existing against the islands.

FOUR TRADE-RELATIONS PERIODS

Mr. Chairman, in considering this whole problem we should keep in mind, first, the trade relations of the islands and the United States prior to the effective date of the independence act. Second, the period from November 15, 1935, the date of inauguration of the Commonwealth government, until November 15, 1940, the first 5-year period. Third, the last 5-year period, completing the transition period, and during which time the export taxes are to be assessed. And fourth, the economy that is likely to govern both in the islands and in the United States after full independence is in operation. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is most difficult to proceed on a satisfactory basis of discussion because of the unknown factors or elements to be dealt with. I refer specifically to two propositions which must be considered: The forthcoming United States-Philippine trade, economic, and Pacific defense—for the Philippine Islands—conference, which will probably be called soon, and the correction of "imperfections or inequalities" referred to in the President's message of March 2, 1934. We should keep in mind the current effect of such interim acts as the Jones-Costigan sugar bill, the Cordage Act of 1935, and the coconut-oil act.

PRESIDENT QUEZON NOW IN THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, February 13, 1937, President Manuel Luis Quezon arrived on our Pacific coast with his military adviser, Maj. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and a large retinue of stenographers, nurses, cooks, valets, and other aides. President Quezon is anxious to have the trade conference held at an early date so that as much uncertainty as possible may be eliminated from the economic picture. It is understood that in a general way he is quite satisfied (for the time being) with the operation of the sugar restriction and quota as set forth in the independence act and the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act. Personally, I am confident that he will ask for a trade agreement of some type that will be much more favorable to the islands than the independence act, the sugar act, the cordage act, and the coconut-oil act. It is clearly evident now, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of the independence act was only the beginning.

NAVAL RESERVATIONS AND FUELING STATIONS OF UNITED STATES IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Section 10 (b) of the independence act provides that—

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations with the government of the Philippine Islands, not later than 2 years after his proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippine Islands, for the adjustment and settlement of all questions relating to naval reservations and fueling stations of the United States in the Philippine Islands, and pending such adjustment and settlement the matter of naval reservations and fueling stations shall remain in its present status.

President Quezon, under a San Pedro, Calif., date line of February 13, 1937, is quoted as having said the Philippines "do not fear aggression from any nation." It would be most interesting to have President Quezon elaborate on this statement. For the moment, I must agree with him. But, let the military and naval forces of the United States now quartered in the Philippines pack, pull anchor, and sail away, and let me ask how long President Quezon would feel that his commonwealth was so "free from aggression from any nation."

Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent for us to consider in this connection the assembling in the North Pacific of combat planes, fighting ships, and other preparations by the United States, Japan, and Russia. At what other time in the world's history have such staggering sums of money been expended for war craft in time of peace and in such a concentrated area? What does it all mean? How long can active conflict be deferred? These are questions which President Quezon and his military adviser, Maj. Gen. Douglas MacArthur have not overlooked. There are no longer any treaty restrictions of consequence on Japan, the United States, and Russia, in the building of fortifications, capital ships, and combat airplanes in this area.

STRATEGIC PROXIMITY OF FOUR GREAT POWERS TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Hong Kong is the military and naval base of Great Britain in China. This port is only 631 nautical miles from Manila and 85 miles farther from San Francisco than is Manila. While Manila is 6,221 nautical miles from San Francisco, Shanghai is only 5,387 and Yokohama, Japan, is only 4,536. The distance in nautical miles from Shanghai to Manila is 1,162, from Tientsin to Manila is 1,736, from Fusan to Manila is 1,468, from Nagasaki to Manila is 1,306, and from Vladivostok to Manila is 1,912. These short distances, compared to the mileage from San Francisco to Manila by direct route of 6,221 miles, helps one to comprehend the impossibility of our defending the Philippine Islands against an attack by a world power such as Japan or Russia, with their military, naval, and other supply bases so near to Manila.

COVERT ATTEMPT TO KEEP UNITED STATES IN THE ISLANDS

Mr. Chairman, I submit this question: Can independence be won and maintained if the United States chooses to maintain military and naval reservations in the islands after the establishment of independence? Let us look at the answer. President Quezon submits to this question. April 4, 1935, in his testimony before the Insular Affairs Committee of the House and in answer to an interrogation propounded by me he said:

I was opposed to the acceptance of the original Hawes-Hare Act concerning the Philippine Islands. I fought it and succeeded in getting the legislature to defeat it, because I did not think it was fair. I was sent here by the legislature after we defeated that act to see whether we could get a better law. I succeeded in getting Congress to eliminate one of our main objections to the act, which objection referred to the right of the United States to maintain military and naval reservations in the islands after the establishment of independence. I objected to that provision, because I could not conceive of a country being independent while another country maintained a military and naval establishment within its borders.

Can it be there is a covert conspiracy to keep the United States in the islands? Certainly we have its equivalent. The commercial interests in both the United States and the islands are exerting pressure commensurate with their financial stake in the economic life and transactions involved. With this group we have another, which promotes the school of thought that the United States is morally bound to maintain our racial prestige—white over the yellow race. Along with these two groups we have others who would and do insist that military and naval bases be maintained in the islands as a strategic asset. Furthermore, let the least bit of a ripple occur indicating that some foreign nation is pressing the islands a little too much, and immediately there will arise a great cry that we must protect the Filipinos from such aggression. This last-mentioned element may be dormant just at the moment in both the islands and the United States, but I assure you that it would require but very little to provoke the commercial interests just mentioned into demanding prompt action on the part of the United States in defense of the investments in the territories involved which are dependent upon peaceful trade relations.

EFFECTIVENESS OF MILITARY AND NAVAL BASE AT MANILA

Is it not true that the establishment of such a base would prevent the peaceful independence of the islands? I think President Quezon was right in contending there could be no peace, no independence, under such circumstances. Such a base would require a cash expenditure for fixed and floating equipment of from $250,000,000 to $800,000,000. The base alone would probably cost at least $100,000,000. We would have to split our Navy three ways—a division on the Atlantic, one on the Pacific, and the other in Asiatic-Philippine waters. No doubt but that we would eventually have to build a Philippine navy. What would Japan have to say about such a move? What would Japan do with her strength lying directly between the United States and the Philippine Islands? Japan is already answering this question in her fortifications of the Caroline Islands.

Japan's nearness to the Philippines places her in position to build speedy defense and offense craft, both water and air, capable of traveling to and from the base of supplies at terrific speed, and with more effectiveness than anything we could possibly build for long-range operation. Her dollar cost would be only a fraction of what we would entail. Japan is "in the heart of Asiatic waters"; we are from 6,000 to 10,000 miles away. Effectiveness! Great ships and great guns! What would we do—what could we do in the event of an uprising of the Filipinos against their own government—against the United States Government? The non-Christian tribes are still in the Philippine Islands. They have not yet been subdued by the Christian tribes. While it may be true the non-Christians have some respect for the Colt .45-caliber automatic, it is not true they are willing to be governed by the Christian tribes. In the event of a general uprising, let me ask how many men and at what cost would the United States have to dispatch to the islands. Such an uprising would undoubtedly have the sympathy if not the support of some foreign power like Japan, with all of her present and increasing investments and nationals now in the islands. Should this happen, there would then be a "Japanese-Philippine incident" for the United States to worry about. We know the task involved in moving men from our Atlantic coast ports to nearby European ports at a time when there were friendly shores on which to land. But the distance from the Atlantic seaboard, where the greater portion of men must be obtained for active warfare, to the Philippine Islands is almost three times as great as the distance to European ports. No such an expeditionary force has ever been transported for such a great distance by any country in the history of the world. No one knows the cost in dollars and men. It would be an undertaking such as our people do not cherish at this time. I predict it is one of such a character that the American mothers now living and those to come will never be anxious for their sons to participate in.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF RESIDENT COMMISSIONER QUINTIN PAREDES

Commissioner PAREDES has recommended to President Quezon that an attempt be made soon to adjust the following problems. No doubt they will be fully discussed at the forthcoming trade conference:

(a) Economic provisions of the independence act.

(b) Tariff autonomy for the islands.

(c) Definition of the War and State Departments.

(d) The immigration and treatment of Filipinos in the United States.

(e) Definition of the duties of the High Commissioner.

(f) The possibility of sending Filipinos to the United States Military and Naval Academies.

(g) The indemnity to which the Philippines is entitled to account of the devaluation of the dollar, and so forth.

(h) The possibility of Filipinos being engaged as attachés in the Foreign Diplomatic Service of the United States.

It is perfectly clear to all students of this Philippine question that Commissioner PAREDES is much concerned about the state of confusion that now exists, not only with reference to economic matters but others just as important.

There is, without question, great confusion in the minds of many because of the lack of definition of responsibility as between the Army, the Navy, the State Department, the High Commissioner from the United States, the Resident Commissioner to the United States, the economic provisions of the independence act, the economic and trade conference, and the correction of imperfections or inequalities. What chance, may I ask, has the Resident Commissioner to proceed with a sound program for his people while he is engulfed in such a sea of confusion and contradiction. We have his hands tied. He is being forced to pursue a game of watchful waiting. The same can be said in a way of those who have built industries in the United States dependent very largely on exports to the islands and those in the islands who have invested for the purpose of production for export to the States—all of which has been carried on under a regime of free trade.

SUGAR'S POSITION IN PHILIPPINE ECONOMY

With seven crops accounting for 95 percent of the total value of agricultural production of the islands in 1934, sugar occupied first position with rice second. Sugar is produced almost entirely for export, while in the case of rice an insufficient quantity is produced for home consumption. The value of the sugar crop for the year under review amounted to 46.4 percent of the total crop value, while rice accounted for only 29.9 percent. The acreage devoted to rice amounted to 4,952,320 and to sugarcane only 755,840 acres, being 49.9 percent and 7.6 percent, respectively, of the total land area under cultivation.

In four principal producing areas we find about 95 percent of the total sugar crop being produced—in the islands of Negros (Occidental and Oriental) and Panay, in the Provinces of Pampanga, Bataan, and Tarlac located in the central plain of Luzon, north of Manila; the Provinces of Batangas and Laguna, south of Manila, and the island of Cebu. (See Tariff Commission report—United States-Philippine trade). With a population of more than 13,000,000 souls we are advised about 15 percent of the total is dependent upon sugar operations for their subsistence. The estimated percentage of population dependent on sugar ranges in producing areas above mentioned from 10 percent up to as high as 90 percent. We should keep in mind, however, that the total percentage is very low and that the area for the production of sugar is highly concentrated.

Page 24 of a Summary of Information About the Philippine Sugar Industry, prepared and compiled by the office of the Philippine Sugar Association of Manila under date of November 17, 1932—since then new investments made in sugar have been very small—shows the total aggregate investments in the Philippine sugar industry to be:

Investments in centrals (manufacturing mills)	₱168,025,069
Investments in lands	280,000,000
Crop loans	25,000,000
Miscellaneous investments	10,000,000
Total investments	483,025,069

One peso equals 50 cents American gold. Dollar investment, $241,512,534.50.

(Tariff Commission report Jan. 1937, vol. 1, p. 109, $265,000,000.)

The association's report further states that of the total investment aggregating 168,025,069 pesos invested in the centrals, 40 percent is American investment, 37 percent Filipino, 22 percent Spanish, and 1 percent cosmopolitan:

Nationality	Number of centrals	Total investments	Percentage of total investments
		Pesos
American	12	67,631,300	40
Filipino	22	62,255,787	37
Spanish	9	36,553,147	22
Cosmopolitan	2	1,584,835	1
Total	45	168,025,069	100

Of the total estimated income of the Philippine government for 1933 of 48,000,000 pesos, the sugar industry directly and indirectly expected to be assessed about 20,471,637 pesos, or, say, 43 percent. Five important Provinces derive almost their entire revenue from the sugar industry. Should the 970,000 short tons equivalent of sugar now allowed to come into the United States free of duty be assessed an export tax of $1.875 per 100 pounds, the full duty now applicable, this would impose an additional tax burden on the industry of about $36,375,000. Of course, for the sixth year only 5 percent is to be assessed; for the seventh year, 10 percent; for the eighth year, 15 percent; for the ninth year, 20 percent; and for the tenth year of the Commonwealth period, only 25 percent. After the tenth year, or July 4, 1946, the full tax or duty is to apply. As previously stated, section 13 of the Independence Act provides that after the islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries, and so forth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see in what position the sugar industry, the major one of the islands, will be in to meet these heavy burdens. It is a most interesting problem here presented. There is a marked interdependence between this industry, independence for the people of the islands, the economy of the Commonwealth, and the future "mothering" the United States will probably extend to the islands. The cost of producing raw sugar can be broken down into two general elements: (a) Agricultural costs and (b) factory costs. Labor costs make up the principal element in each of these two classes. Quoting from the most recently published report of the Tariff Commission, January 1937, pages 87–88, we find:

The wages of employees in sugar centrals vary in accordance with the type of work performed and the length of working day, which ranges from 8 to 12 hours. Employees are provided with houses, water, fuel, garden space, and in many cases light as part of their remuneration. Unskilled manual labor is paid a minimum wage of 5 cents per hour with a daily return of from 40 to 60 cents. Semiskilled laborers, such as oilers and weighers, receive from 60 cents to $1.25 per day, while skilled laborers, such as machinists, mechanics, engineers, and carpenters are paid from $1.25 to $3.50 per day. Unskilled plantation laborers are generally paid 15 to 25 cents per day. Skilled laborers, such as foremen, mechanics, and truck drivers, receive from 50 cents to $1 per day.

Compared to the wages paid by American sugar-beet and cane growers, these wages are exceedingly low. In other words, everything entering into the cost of producing sugar in the islands which can be obtained through employment of labor in the islands is obtainable at very low costs. This is a tremendous advantage to the sugar industry in its effort to survive the restrictions to be placed on it under provisions of the Independence Act. Let us look at another very important element:

PRICE PREMIUMS BEING PAID BY CONSUMERS IN UNITED STATES TO PHILIPPINE SUGAR INTERESTS

The United States Tariff Commission is responsible for the statement that—

The average spread between the United States and world prices in 1935 was as follows:

	Cents per pound
United States quotation, 96° sugar, spot price	3.230
Transportation cost, Cuba to New York (average for 1935)	.115
Net United States quotations, f. o. b. Cuba	3.115
London quotations, f. o. b. Cuba	.875
Differential between United States and world price	2.240

Under the terms of the Independence Act, the Philippines, during the Commonwealth period, are permitted to sell duty free in the United States market the approximate equivalent of 970,000 short tons of 96° sugar. Because of this privilege the islands received $43,456,000 in 1935 (on a basis of average prices in that year) more than they would have obtained if they had sold an equivalent amount of sugar in the world market. This sum may also be regarded as the 'premium' which the United States paid for Philippine sugar on the present duty-free quota basis, as compared with what the cost to the United States would have been if it had purchased an equivalent amount of sugar at world prices. On a basis of existing United States duties, the annual loss in revenue to the United States Treasury resulting from the duty-free admission of Philippine sugar may be calculated to range from $36,375,000 to $17,460,000.

February 4, 1937, in my presentation to the Members of the House, I gave comparable figures on "price premium" and loss in revenue on sugar we are purchasing from Cuba, and at that time showed our loss in revenue amounting to $86,354,466 and price premium paid of $158,478,601.94, or a total of $244,833,067.94 subsidy given to Cuba by the sugar consumers of the United States under the reciprocal-trade treaty and Jones-Costigan Sugar Act now in operation and applying to sugar imports from Cuba.

With a subsidy to the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands amounting to $43,456,000 annually in the form of a "price premium" (forgetting for the time being the loss in revenue to the United States Treasury, ranging from seventeen to thirty-six million dollars annually) it can be seen that within 2 years we will have subsidized the industry a sufficient amount to completely provide for investments in the sugar centrals (factories), and that within a period of 6 years we will have provided a subsidy sufficient to cover the entire investments in centrals, lands, crop loans, miscellaneous investments owned by the Americans, Filipinos, Spanish, and cosmopolitan investors who have made their investments during the past 40 years. Is that not generosity to the *n*th degree?

No one will deny the statement to the effect that the net operating profits of the well-managed sugar concerns in the Philippine Islands are very high, and companies are paying and have been paying most generous cash dividends. Why not, when such a subsidy is being received from the consumers of the United States? Furthermore, it would be very interesting to have a detailed statement showing the high depreciation rates that are being provided against operating revenues before arriving at net profits. In other words, it is perfectly safe to say that the sugar industry of the islands is putting its house in order and that if we will only continue the present program for a few years longer, the industry will have been able to write off as operating expense the entire cost of its properties and, in addition, to refund to investors, in the form of cash dividends, the money previously invested in the industry. With the industry following this program and thus supported by our present sugar policy, which is very likely to continue for some time to come, is not the industry in position to meet this situation?

In the Far East (Asiatic-India-Chinese-Japanese area) we have the following sugar areas which would be competitors of the Philippine Islands should the United States close its free market to the Philippines.

Sugar production

Area	1936-37	1935-36	1933-34	1930-31
	Tons	Tons	Tons	Tons
British India	6,000,000	6,102,000	5,242,000	3,218,000
Java	1,400,000	567,154	505,438	2,798,870
Formosa and Japan	1,188,000	1,091,935	803,143	928,751

This presents an economic problem related to sugar similar to that which has existed in the Western Hemisphere, particularly insofar as the United States market is concerned. Standing ready to supply the sugar needs of the consumers of the United States we have had Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, United States sugarcane and sugar-beet fields and the Philippine Islands. It is interesting to make this pertinent observation: In the calendar year 1928 we consumed 5,542,636 long tons of refined and (or) consumption value of sugar. The crop year 1928–29 Cuba alone produced 5,156,315 tons of sugar, while the same year production in other sugar fields supplying the United States market was as follows:

	Tons
Continental United States, cane and beet	1,056,545
Hawaiian Islands	844,462
Puerto Rico	530,116
Virgin Islands	3,796
Philippine Islands	740,987
Total, not including Cuba	3,175,906
Cuba's production	5,136,315
Total production preferential sugar for United States market	8,312,221
United States consumption	5,542,636
Excess preferential production over consumption	2,769,585

In other words, an excess production for our market amounting to 50 percent of consumption.

Mr. Chairman, it is very evident the Far East sugar-producing area now faces just such a sugar problem, in the event the terms of the independence act are carried out, which has been faced and met, temporarily at least, by the sugar areas of the Western Hemisphere producing and supplying sugar to the great consuming market of the United States. The problem was met through reducing acreage devoted to the production of sugar and substituting other crops. In behalf of the citizens of the United States located in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and, last but not least, the sugar-beet and sugarcane growers of the United States, let me suggest that the Filipinos and other sugar producers operating in areas geographically situated to compete with the islands, immediately take serious and drastic steps to put their "sugar bowl" in order. The American sugar consumer may soon grow weary of the burden he is now carrying wherein the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands is being subsidized at a rate of more than $40,000,000 annually.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

In the light of action taken by this House only a few days ago, there is another important phase of this question which should have our attention at this moment. I refer to the matter of trade agreements and the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act giving the President and the Secretary of State sweeping powers to effect agreements with foreign countries.

May I ask by what line of reasoning Congress arrived at the proposition of assessing full duties against the products of the Philippines Islands coming into the United States when it knew full well the reciprocal agreements would be entered into and that Cuba would reap the full benefits of reciprocity? The Congress also knew that Cuba would receive preferential treatment on duties in addition to those received under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. When we made a cash settlement with Spain for her outlay she had made in the Philippine Islands, did we not assume a responsibility which has not yet been discharged in behalf of the Filipinos? Have they not been under our supervision for more than three decades? Have we not permitted, encouraged, and assisted in the development of the industries of the islands and all to operate on a "duty free" basis insofar as exports to the United States are concerned? Are not our obligations to the Filipinos as broad, deep, and as sacred as are our obligations to the Cubans? Shall we let Cuba hold the "threat of revolution" over us daily and thereby demand and receive much fairer treatment than we extend to the Filipinos? Shall we say to the Filipinos, "You are not a part of us. You shall be treated as other foreign nations with which we have no close ties of friendship or other relations. You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting?" Are we more duty bound to protect Cuba against revolution than we are to protect the Philippine Islands against a similar trouble? Shall distance determine the international policy to be followed by the United States in dealing with those otherwise so close to us as are the Filipinos? Can the argument be sustained that Cuba is worth more to us from a commercial standpoint than are the more than 13,000,000 souls of the Philippine Islands? These and other questions are now before this Congress; they are running through the minds of the Filipino leaders—those charged with the responsibility of working out the future economic and international relationship of this present Commonwealth and coming Republic. These leaders have not, and we should not, forget the collusion engaged in to poison the minds of the American public against sugar production in the Philippines, and all in an attempt to remove the cloud of suspicion and direct public attention away from the production of sugar in Cuba. These questions will have consideration at the forthcoming trade conference, but after the conference Congress will have to act. The responsibility is on the Members of this House.

THE "ASIATIC MONROE DOCTRINE—OR YELLOW PERIL"

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me sum up this first presentation dealing with this very important question of Philippine economic future. We come down to the vital question: Does "territorial propinquity create special relations between countries"? It is claimed the United States is in no position to protest the declaration of the Asiatic Monroe doctrine by Japan. From a geographical standpoint, as well as that of population and also current history and international politics, Japan is "in the saddle" in the Far East. These are facts we must recognize. These facts, Mr. Chairman, can be discussed without bringing into the picture great emotion. We do not have to become sensational. The fact remains, as I have already pointed out, that Japan is very close to the Philippines, geographically and racially. Along the shore of China, for a distance of about 2,000 miles, we find the Empire of Japan scattered from Taiwan (Formosa) and running northward to the tip of Kamchatka. When visibility is good one can stand on Philippine soil and see with the naked eye Japanese territory. To the south and eastward of the Philippine Islands we find the Japanese mandated territory known as the Marianas, Carolines, and Marshalls Islands—all mandated to Japan by the Treaty of Versailles. Going southward from the Philippine Islands we find the British and Dutch territories known as the East Indies. Sailing westward for 2 or 3 days we find the shore of China—Hong Kong (British), French Indochina, and Portuguese Macao.

Japan has made it very clear to the thinking world that she will in the future be the guardian of the Philippines. Quite naturally, Japan will likely await the formal announcement of this until the Philippines receive full independence. Japan, with a square mileage approximately that of Texas, has a population of 100,000,000 souls.

Her crowded population is increasing at the rate of 1,000,000 souls annually. One island alone in the Philippine group—Mindanao—will accommodate an additional 20,000,000 souls. Throughout the Philippine Islands there is ample room at the present for many millions more. In addition, there is China, with about one-fourth of the total world population. China and Japan need, and will take, the unutilized natural resources and land areas of the Philippine Islands and the United States is without the power to prevent this happening, even if we desired to do so. In a way we have acknowledged all of this through the notes of Lansing and Ishii of 1917.

Now, if we are to concede Japan is to exercise guardianship over the Philippine Islands as soon as independence is granted, let us proceed on such a basis in the working out of our economic and political relations with the Filipinos. Why should we become entangled in a set of policies which cannot be supported when Japan really "moves in"? If no reciprocal-trade agreements are to be consummated with Japan, then why with the Philippine Islands? If it is the plan of our State Department under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act to extend its benefits to Japan, either in the name of material gain or for "world peace" purposes or motives, then how can we deny extending to the Filipinos similar trade benefits? Furthermore, if we are to recognize Japanese guardianship over the Philippine Islands, why should we attempt in any way whatsoever to maintain military and naval reservations in the islands? To do so would involve us in most serious international trouble. It would be acknowledging Japan's guardianship and at the same time saying to her "we reserve military and naval power" to be exercised at any time we see fit. Every student of international affairs knows such an arrangement would lead to endless trouble on a big scale. To grant free trade to the Philippine Islands and let their production come into the United States and compete with that of our own people and at the same time acknowledge the guardianship of Japan and give the Filipinos independence is unthinkable. [Applause.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that in general debate, such as we have listened to for the past 2 days, it is quite unusual for any Member to refer to anything in the bill under consideration. Therefore, what I have to say may be somewhat of a shock, because I am going to talk about some particular items in the bill and one that I am sorry is not in the bill. I deal with the need of air-mail service in Alaska.

Alaska, as most of the Members doubtless know, is about three times the size of Texas. Its total area is about 589,000 square miles. So if Alaska were inset into the United States, you would find it touching the Canadian border on the north, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, the Atlantic Ocean on the east, and the most westerly of its string of Aleutian Islands, which reach out toward Asia, would be buried in the Pacific on the west. I merely give this as an illustration so that you can envision something of the size of the country which I have the honor to represent in Congress.

We have no air mail in Alaska, as that term is commonly used in the United States. Mail is carried by air in Alaska, but it is carried under what is known as star-route service. It is carried by air because the contractors who made the bid to carry it by air made the lowest bids. In other words, mail can be carried by air in certain parts of Alaska in certain seasons much more cheaply than it can be carried by any other means of transportation.

Alaska is the last frontier. A great deal of it is wilderness in the real sense of that term. Much of it is unsettled, even unprospected. Thousands of square miles are unmapped. Only about one-third of Alaska has even been mapped with any degree of detail. This whole northern section to which I am pointing now has never been surveyed as the country in the United States is surveyed. Consequently, maps are not entirely reliable. One of the airplane pilots told me a story to illustrate that. He found a place on a map where he was told he would find a pass 5,000 feet high. So he flew for it. It was north of the Yukon, on the route to Barrow, on the Arctic coast. When he got to that pass, he found it was nearly 10,000 feet high. He had to go above 10,000 feet to get through the pass, where he thought he could get through at something over 5,000 feet. That illustrates one of the hazards of flying in Alaska.

We do need air mail in Alaska, because we have very little in the way of roads or railroads. We have the Government railroad, which starts at Seward and runs north to Fairbanks, in the interior of Alaska. We have a motor road which extends from Valdez, on the southern coast, to Circle City, on the Yukon River.

Outside of this Government railroad and the one long motor road to which I have referred, we have very little in the way of roads in Alaska—something less than 2,000 miles in all that vast stretch of country. Consequently when we wish to travel from one part of Alaska to another it is almost necessary to fly. We fly perhaps more in proportion to the population than the people of any other country in the world, and we find it cheaper to do so. We find it necessary to fly, and we fly over country that is very largely unsurveyed, much of it not well known, and sometimes under conditions which would alarm a good many of the people who fly here in the States. We do not have lights every 25 or 30 miles, and few emergency landing fields. But it has worked out pretty well and we are used to it.

In company with people from the Department who are in favor of a regular air-mail service in Alaska in the same way that it is understood in the States, I appeared before the subcommittee, and I must say here in fairness to the subcommittee, in justice to the subcommittee and its members, that we were given a very full and complete hearing. We were not hurried. We explained the whole situation to them, and as a result the bill contains an item of $68,692 for a weekly round-trip service of the air mail between Juneau, in southeastern Alaska, and Fairbanks, in the interior. This is, however, a foreign air-mail route, and the money carried in the bill to take care of this service is in the lump-sum appropriation for foreign air mail, which amounts in all to several millions of dollars. The distance is about 660 miles from Juneau to Fairbanks and about 300 miles of the route is flown over Yukon Territory, Canada. One stop is made in Yukon Territory, at White Horse. So we have here what may be called two foreign air-mail routes, one from Juneau to White Horse and one from White Horse to Fairbanks. It is, however, all a part of one flight.

I am, of course, very grateful to have this much. We have never had anything like it in the past. An air line, a subsidiary of Pan American Airways, has been operating a regular weekly service for the past year or so between Fairbanks and Juneau, and I have no doubt it has been losing money every trip. This foreign air-mail appropriation will help the carrier of mail between Juneau and Fairbanks to improve and increase the service and will aid in the development of the Territory.

Thankful as I am to have this beginning of air mail in Alaska, I must point out that we also asked and the Department requested, and the Bureau of the Budget recommended, another item of $72,755 to complete the air service on the main line running from Juneau to Fairbanks by developing a line from Tanacross down to the cities of Valdez, Cordova, Seward, and Anchorage, which lie along the coast of Alaska and which contain quite a substantial population. That item, however, is not contained in the bill. When, tomorrow or next day, we reach the proper place in the bill, page 58, line 17, I shall offer an amendment to strike out $207,245 and insert in lieu thereof $280,000, which is the amount recommended by the Budget and the Post Office Department to give this Air Mail Service to the cities on the coast.

Mail will be taken by boat to Juneau, carried by air to Fairbanks, and should then be taken from Fairbanks in the interior to Valdez, Cordova, Seward, and Anchorage. We should have the extra money that is needed to complete the service by going to the rather more thickly populated section of Alaska down here on the coast and taking in the cities of Cordova, Valdez, Seward, and Anchorage.

The extension of air mail in every country and under all conditions is intimately associated with the march of our material civilization. Millions and millions of dollars are being spent by every nation worthy of the name of "civilized" to speed and develop communication by air. The report of the committee on the bill now before us shows that, aside from Alaska, the committee is particularly alive to the desirability and, indeed, the need of developing air commerce not only in the United States but between the United States and the countries which lie over the Atlantic Ocean in one direction and the Pacific Ocean in the other. Millions are being spent in order that the potential profit of billions may be tapped—profits that will accrue not only to ourselves but to the peoples of all of the other nations with which we thus come into intimate commercial contact. And in this "dance of millions", if I may call it that, what reason can there be for an attitude of penury where Alaska is concerned? We do not ask for anything outrageous or unreasonable. We Alaskans are citizens of the United States, and we have the same devotion to the common weal that animates the citizens of the 48 States.

Let me here read to you what the committee very generously—and very justly—says about the item of the bill for the foreign air-mail route between Juneau and Fairbanks, via White Horse, Yukon Territory, Canada, and Tanacross, Alaska. Here it is:

> A route in Alaska, costing $68,692 annually, is recommended for weekly round-trip service from Juneau, Alaska, via White Horse (Yukon Territory) and Tanacross, Alaska, to Fairbanks, a distance of 660 miles. The purpose of the route is to take the mail from the weekly boat at Juneau and put it into Fairbanks, the main distributing point for interior Alaska, at a saving of approximately 4 days. Travel and mail communication in Alaska are difficult because of climatic conditions and the great distances. The proposed line would carry passengers and express and would perhaps produce some additional postal revenue, but the establishment of the service cannot be justified on that basis. What is said about this line is also true of many lines in the United States and in foreign air-mail service. They do not pay for themselves but must be justified on the basis of their assistance to business and speedier communication for our people. Because of the extremely difficult conditions of transportation in Alaska, the committee feels that this primary route will be of benefit in the development of the Territory and an advantageous facility of national life that the people of Alaska should have the benefit of. There is ample justification for it on the basis of the facilities that the Government has provided for citizens living in the States.

Mr. Chairman, every word contained in the paragraph just read is warranted. Money spent within reason to develop and speed commerce is well spent. That is a thousand times true as to commerce between the several States and Territories. The investment is small; the potential returns are vast. The Government is now wisely spending not a few thousands but millions to develop air transportation to the Orient, and in this very bill it is engaging to spend some hundreds of thousands to establish an air-mail route between the United States and Europe. Can any reason be assigned why the little that we ask for in Alaska is not equally well, if not better spent. The question is whether we are to follow in the relatively slow and earth-bound footsteps of our fathers, or whether we are determined to blaze new trails and faster trails through the air.

As I said a moment ago, we already carry mail by the Star Route Service in Alaska. The late great Col. Carl Ben Eilson blazed that particular trail. But the service should be now expanded. We should have air mail in the real sense of that term. The desirability of air-mail service for Alaska was seen by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Hon. Harllee Branch, one of the best and ablest of our public servants, when he visited Alaska in 1934. Last year the Post Office Department estimates contained an item of nearly $250,000 for air-mail service in Alaska, which was approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The Committee on Appropriations eliminated the item from the bill. When the bill was before the House I offered an amendment seeking the insertion of the desired amount, but the amendment was voted down. Then I appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The amount went into the bill in the Senate, but it was lost in conference. A similar item was later inserted in the deficiency bill in the Senate, but it was again lost in conference. The amount is now substantially reduced and the total that we now ask for air-mail service in Alaska is less than $142,000, of which, as I have indicated, the committee has approved the sum of $68,692 for the Juneau-Fairbanks foreign air-mail route, but has eliminated the item of $72,755 for the service between Tanacross and the coast. In refusing the appropriation for the latter route the committee in its report says:

Star routes, Alaska: The appropriation carried is $207,245, which is the current year's figure. It provides for 65 routes under contract for transportation of mail within Alaska by dog team, motor- and horse-drawn vehicles, and airplane. The committee has disallowed a Budget request of $72,755 for an additional air-mail route from Tanacross via Cordova, Valdez, and Anchorage to Seward, a distance of 480 miles, one round trip per week. The committee has placed elsewhere in this bill the funds for an air-mail route from Juneau to Fairbanks via White Horse (Yukon Territory) and Tanacross. The route eliminated from this estimate was expected to tie in with this latter route to expedite delivery of mail arriving by boat from Seattle by taking the mail off the boat at Juneau and putting it into Seward several days earlier than it would otherwise arrive. The committee finds merit in the line from Juneau to Fairbanks but is not impressed with the need of this considerable expenditure in order to expedite the boat mail to Seward by a few days.

With the most respectful deference to the committee and its able and distinguished members individually, may I say that the route from Tanacross south should be considered as a part and parcel of the mail route between Juneau and Fairbanks, and that all of the sound reasons which led to the granting of the item of appropriation for the Juneau-Fairbanks service will in the fullest measure justify the item for the service between Tanacross on the north and Cordova, Valdez, Seward, and Anchorage on the south. This line, too, will, to quote the language of the report, "be of benefit in the development of the Territory and an advantageous facility of national life that the people of Alaska should have the benefit of. There is ample justification for it on the basis of the facilities that the Government has provided for citizens living in the States."

No money carried in the bill can be expended to better advantage for the people of the United States, leaving out of consideration the benefit of the people of Alaska, than this $68,692 now carried in the bill for Juneau-Whitehorse-Tanacross-Fairbanks route and the small amount of $72,755 additional that we request. Let us look at it as one picture. We pick up the air mail at Juneau, carrying it thence to Fairbanks. While that is going to be a great help to the interior of Alaska, in order to complete the service we should go with air mail from Tanacross to the southern coast of Alaska, as planned. We should also, in my judgment, provide regular year-round air mail service from Fairbanks, in the interior of Alaska, to Nome, on the western coast, and to Bethel in southwestern Alaska. Those two routes are also well justified. But since it is not covered in the Budget, I am not asking for that money now, but I am asking that the Congress appropriate $72,755 to complete the service which we hope to have started from Juneau to Fairbanks and having a branch line go from Tanacross down to the southern coast.

The inquiry may be made, What is the need for this? It may be said that we have gotten along all of these years without it, and we can get along without it now. That is true. In Alaska I suppose we could get along if we had no mail sent to Alaska at all. If you simply cut off all the mail service in Alaska, it is very likely most of the people would live somehow or other. I have lived in Alaska for 32 years, and I remember particularly one period of 18 months when I did not receive or send out a single letter. There was no mail service at all to that part of the country at that time. Of course, we survived and lived through it, and I suppose we were fairly happy. But the world has moved on.

I dare say it is hard to justify from the standpoint of dollars and cents and from the standpoint of the postage that is received, the air-mail service in the States. If we had in Alaska the same conveniences for carrying mail that the people of the States enjoy, I do not think we would ask for any air mail at all. If we had roads, railroads, and rural free delivery all over the country so that not a single town, hamlet, or even a farmhouse is omitted from the mail service, I would not be here asking you to enlarge the appropriation for air mail in Alaska. But we have not the roads and railroads, and the only speedy and efficient way in the interior of Alaska that we can get mail is by air; therefore I submit to you that in the interest of your own constituents in your own districts, and for the general welfare of the country, it is wise to appropriate this comparatively small amount of money in order to give us the service we desire, a service that is recommended definitely and even enthusiastically by the Department, and one that meets the approval of the Bureau of the Budget.

You may ask, how is this going to help the people of the United States? It will help them because Alaska is probably the most valuable and profitable resource that the United States of America possesses.

Our annual exports from Alaska, principally in fish, gold, copper, and furs, for the last few years has probably averaged somewhere between 60 and 65 million dollars. Nearly all of it goes to the United States. Our average imports are between 30 and 40 million dollars a year. Most of that comes from the United States. As I pointed out to the Members of the House 2 years ago, if the exportable surpluses of the United States were as great in proportion to population as the exportable surpluses of Alaska, the United States would have the enormous exportable surplus every year of about 66 billion dollars.

Where does this wealth come from? We take, we will say, $30,000,000 of merchandise into Alaska from the United States; and that is quite a substantial market for the people of the United States of various kinds of produce, mining machinery, food, clothing, and almost everything else that human beings, that civilized people use. We send out about $60,000,000. Most of that surplus of $30,000,000 goes into the pockets of people who reside in the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two brief paragraphs, about 20 lines, from the report of this bill now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say that the gentleman's request to include the paragraphs to which reference is made will have to be made in the House.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alaska to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] 10 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to ask the membership of the House to join with me in authorizing a small appropriation for the upkeep of the so-called Congressional Cemetery. I do not know how many of the Members realize it, but there are 2 Vice Presidents, 16 Senators and 68 Congressmen buried in that cemetery.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the reason Congressmen were authorized to be buried in this cemetery was because transportation in early days was so poor it took a long time to send the remains of the Members of Congress back to their homes in their native States.

Mr. Chairman, for a number of years an annual appropriation was made by the Congress for the care of the graves and the cemetery. Today the graves are in a deplorable condition, and the cemetery is in a very unkempt and uncared-for condition. It seems pathetic that our statesmen, including former Members of Congress, should be so little thought of that their graves are not cared for. For 35 years no appropriation has been made for the upkeep of the cemetery. The following are acts of Congress relating to the Congressional Cemetery:

Act of May 31, 1832 (4 Stat. 520, c. 110). Appropriation of $1,500 to aid vestry of Washington parish "in the erection of a keeper's house, for planting trees, boundary stones, and otherwise improving the burial ground, allotted to the interment of Members of Congress, and other officers of the general Government."

Act of July 25, 1848 (9 Stat. 251, sec. 4; 726, sec. 4). United States entitled to buy portion of cemetery "as a burial ground, for Members of Congress and such other members of the United States Government as the President shall deem it expedient and proper to allow."

Act of August 18, 1858 (11 Stat. 88). Appropriation of $5,000 to purchase 500 lots: "Provided, That the same be expended in the construction of an iron fence on the north side of said burial grounds."

Act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 226). Appropriation of $2,200 for flagging footway. (Amended by 11 Stat. 325, sec. 2.)

Act of May 18, 1858 (11 Stat. 289, ch. 38). United States to retain land formerly included in certain streets "for the interment of Members of Congress or such officers of the Government as may die in Washington."

Act of March 3, 1869 (15 Stat. 309). Appropriation of $3,000 for care, improvement and repair, to be expended under direction of wardens and vestry of Christ Church.

Act of July 15, 1870 (16 Stat. 309). Appropriation of $3,500 for erection of monuments in memory of Representatives who died since 1860.

Act of May 18, 1872 (17 Stat. 131). Appropriation of $3,000 for repair and improvement, to be expended under direction of warden and vestry of Washington parish.

Act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. 540). Appropriation of $2,000 for repair and improvement, to be expended under direction of officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 375). Appropriation of $1,500 for "monuments in memory of those Representatives who have died since the erection of those last authorized."

Act of May 23, 1876 (19 Stat. 54; U. S. Code 2:51). Monuments to be erected to Members actually interred in the cemetery, out of contingent fund of Senate or House.

Joint resolution of January 16, 1899 (30 Stat. 1387, No. 8). Removal of remains of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins to Arlington National Cemetery; $500 appropriated.

Act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. 1236, sec. 6). Repeal of portion of act of May 18, 1858, above.

Act of June 27, 1916 (39 Stat. 1300, ch. 177). Removal of remains of Charles H. Bingham to Lock Haven, Pa., authorized.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD at this point a description of this cemetery by Helen Essary.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts (reading):

Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, of Massachusetts, is planning to ask Congress to look into the state of its own Congressional Cemetery.

The cemetery, on high ground overlooking the Anacostia River, lies between E and G, Eighteenth and Nineteenth Streets SE. Congress once felt a responsibility for the graves of the 2 Vice Presidents, the 2 Cabinet members, of the 16 Senators and 68 Congressmen, the cenotaphs, the trees, and the shrubbery there.

But for years now the burying ground—or that part of it in which Congress is supposed to have an interest—has been one of Washington's stepchildren.

Perhaps this congressional aloofness is a result of confusion in ownership. Some authorities say the cemetery belongs entirely to the Christ Church. Others insist a certain section is the property of Congress.

In any event, congressional appropriations for upkeep of any part of the burial ground ceased about 35 years ago. Today the town offers no better place in which to hunt for forgotten pomp and pathos than the lots where public men are interred.

For long after its beginning, in 1807, the cemetery seemed a trying distance by carriage from most anywhere. President Adams tells in his diary that "just after noon he joined the funeral cortege of his old friend, Gen. Jacob Brown. The roads were heavy with mud. It was near 3 o'clock before we reached the grave."

For the early days of the Republic all Congressmen who died in office were supposed to be buried in the Congressional Cemetery. Or if they were not actually interred there, a monument was raised to their memory.

These monuments were curiously fashioned of the same size, shape, and material, with a cone-shaped top, resting on a square block.

When 85 of such cenotaphs had been put in place, it seemed to even a vague mind that there wasn't space to raise a monument to every worthy official who died in office.

The white stones soon grew yellow with neglect. Jails and almshouses moved in as neighbors. As a part of official Washington the Congressional Cemetery passed out of public thought. But the names on many of its forgotten headstones are those of men who played big roles in the development of this country.

There, for instance, lies Tobias Lear. Tobias was buried on the hillside by the Anacostia after he had killed himself in his garden pavilion. Tobias, so the words on his tombstone say, "was the private secretary and familiar friend of the illustrious Washington. * * * His desolate widow and mourning son have erected this monument to mark the place of his abode in the city of silence."

The inscriptions on old tombstones are fascinating reading. Descendants of the modern great and near-great are self-conscious about the characteristics of their ancestors. But in the young 1800's no such inhibitions held back the kind words for posterity to read.

On the monument of Vice President Elbridge Gerry, who died suddenly in his carriage on his way to preside at the Senate, the inscription says that "in his death he fulfilled his own memorable injunction: 'It is the duty of every citizen, though he may have but one day to live, to devote that day to his country.'"

Vice President Clint's epitaph declares that "He filled with unexampled usefulness, purity, and ability many high offices", and "left an illustrious example of a well-spent life worthy of imitation."

Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, a Choctaw chief and "a warrier of great distinction", is the only Indian who lies in the Congressional Cemetery. He died in the "sixtieth year of his age of the croup." The inscription on his monument adds in faded marble letters: "Under all circumstances the white man's friend." Among his last words were: "When I am gone, let the big guns be fired over me."

Mrs. ROGERS hopes that Congress will renew its appropriation for the care of this historic old cemetery. Such an appropriation would likely have to be made on sentimental grounds. When funeral pomp was important in Washington, and long, melancholy processions proceeded slowly across the cobblestones, burials of deceased public men were paid for.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I hope, Mr. Chairman, we may devote some time to a consideration of this matter and provide an adequate appropriation to properly preserve this cemetery in memory of these splendid men. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

TEACHING OR ADVOCATING COMMUNISM IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the proviso appearing in the fourteenth paragraph under the subheading 'Miscellaneous' under the heading 'Public schools', in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, approved June 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 356), and reading as follows: 'Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person teaching or advocating communism' is hereby repealed."

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me this is a very inappropriate time to take this matter up on a motion to concur. There has been general debate all day and the Members are at their offices working and this would entail some further action. Of course, I shall object, if necessary, but it seems to me that the gentlewoman from New Jersey ought to defer this for further action tomorrow, in view of the lateness of the hour.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request and ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I want to make the observation that the House has acted on this matter in a firm way. While the House has no control over the managers on the part of the House who may be appointed, there is an understanding, to say the least, that the managers on the part of the House will fight for the position of the House. I assume the gentlewoman from New Jersey, as one of the managers, intends to fight for the position the House has taken. I shall not ask for an answer from the gentlewoman from New Jersey if that will embarrass her; but, on the other hand, if I disagreed with a bill and the House took counter action and I was one of the managers on the part of the House, I would fight for the position taken by the House, because I would not be acting in my individual capacity, but as a manager I would represent the House.

I hope the three managers who are appointed will do this, but, in any event, later developments will show whether they do so or not, and if they do not, it is really immaterial because the matter has to come back to the House. On the other hand, there is that feeling of consolation, there is that feeling of satisfaction on the part of the Members of the House when we see a report showing that the managers on the part of the House fought for the position of the House, and there is a feeling of embarrassment when they see a report showing clearly that the managers on the part of the House did not fight for the position that the House took.

With these observations, I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to this matter going to conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a purported interview on the part of the gentlewoman from New Jersey appearing in the News of February 9 last, reading as follows:

Chairman MARY NORTON, of the House District Committee, who led a valiant fight for the Kennedy repealer bill, expressed hope that the rider still may be eliminated this session.

She said that she, KENNEDY, and Representative DIRKSEN, Republican, Illinois, probably would be named conferees to meet with Senate agents, who will bring with them the Wheeler bill for outright repeal.

The House conferees, Mrs. NORTON said, will agree to the Senate measure. In reporting their action to the House, Mrs. NORTON said she will insist on a roll call of the entire membership.

Before I object, or do not object, I ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey if that alleged interview represents her position.

Mrs. NORTON. I do not recall having said any such thing as the gentleman has read.

Mr. TABER. Does that interview represent the gentlewoman's position?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

QUALIFICATION OF PRACTITIONERS OF LAW, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate of the United States:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 15, 1937.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 204) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Senate?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon in Committee of the Whole and to include therein two brief excerpts from the report on the bill under consideration, H. R. 4720.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, immediately after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the reading of the Journal, that I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, Monday next is Washington's birthday. A great many Members who will be away do not want to return on that day. That is District day. There is nothing apparently that will be taken up on Tuesday. I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday, February 22, be in order on Tuesday, February 23.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

By unanimous consent, Mr. HALLECK was permitted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John H. Sullivan, H. R. 9737, Seventy-fourth Congress, and H. R. 620, Seventy-fifth Congress, pending before the Committee on Pensions, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. HALLECK also was permitted to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies, papers in the case of John H. Sullivan, H. R. 9734, Seventy-fourth Congress, and H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Most Reverend Archbishop Antony Bashir, Syrian Antiochian Archdiocese, Brooklyn, N. Y., offered the following prayer:

O Lord and Master Jesus Christ, our God, fountain of life and immortality, creator of all things visible and invisible, Thou who art worshipped and glorified at all times and at every hour and place, both in heaven and on earth, who art long suffering and plenteous in mercy and compassion, who lovest the just and showeth mercy to sinners, and who callest all men to salvation through the promise of blessings to come; O Thou that art the same Lord, receive these our supplications and direct our lives in the way of Thy commandments. Sanctify our souls. Purify our bodies. Set aright our thoughts. Cleanse our minds. Deliver us from all affliction, trouble, and distress. Compass us about with Thy divine providence, that guided and guarded by Thy truth we may always walk in Thy ways of peace, love, and understanding. Bless these Thy servants, the Members of this honorable House, who have been chosen to lead Thy people and maintain justice and good will among men, sending down upon them wisdom and knowledge of Thine unapproachable glory; for Thou art blessed for ever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on February 9, 1937, the President approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 3587. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 4064. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House may have permission to sit this afternoon during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. WOODRUM, JOHNSON of Oklahoma, FITZPATRICK, JOHNSON of West Virginia, HOUSTON, WIGGLESWORTH, and DIRKSEN.

FUNDS FOR HEALTH AND SANITATION ACTIVITIES IN FLOOD AREAS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I submit House Joint Resolution 229, to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I believe this resolution should be passed as soon as possible; and I concur in the gentleman's request that it be taken up immediately by unanimous consent. I do hope, however, that a few minutes will be taken to explain the resolution to the Members of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not—the gentleman will remember that last year we tried to have a similar bill passed to benefit the people of Pennsylvania and New England, who faced a very similar situation, but at that time we could not get the House of Representatives to agree to it.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not—I may say to the Members present that later on we hope to lay a proposition before Congress that will at least make possible a start toward the control of floods in western Pennsylvania and eastern United States. We are going along on this resolution, but we are going to ask you later on to go along on our proposition of flood control for eastern United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to allocate funds to the United States Public Health Service for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods from the appropriation made in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, as supplemented by the appropriation for relief and work relief in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1937, for the following purposes: (1) Grants to States for the purpose of aiding such States, or any county, health district, or other political subdivision thereof, in establishing and maintaining adequate public health services in the prevention and control of diseases in the areas recently stricken by floods, under regulations prescribed by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service; (2) the employment of personnel in the city of Washington and elsewhere, without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to replace commissioned officers and other employees of such Public Health Service detailed to such areas; (3) reimbursement of appropriations of such Service for expenditures made from such appropriations for emergency work in such areas; and (4) the purchase of supplies and equipment to replace articles furnished from stock on hand for the care, support, and maintenance of flood refugees and in rendering assistance to health authorities.

The allocations made by authority of this joint resolution shall not be exclusive but shall be in addition to those which otherwise may be made under the provisions of such Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, as supplemented.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the deficiency subcommittee held ample hearings on this matter and all the members felt that the showing fully justified immediate action of the House and Senate upon this relief measure. The entire committee carefully considered the subject this forenoon and unanimously approved this Resolution No. 229. It is a matter involving purely health and urgently needed sanitary and widespread activity by the Public Health Service.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this resolution comes up under unanimous consent, and I think the House should have a full explanation of its purposes, and I hope to make that explanation as quickly as possible.

There is authority in the general law for the President to allocate out of relief funds such money as in his judgment may be necessary to the Public Health Service, and under this authority the sum of $245,000 has been allotted out of emergency funds to the Public Health Service, which was used in the recent flood disaster in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is necessary because of the desire of the Public Health Service, instead of expanding these funds which it proposes to use under this authority itself, to use them by making direct grants to the 177 counties in the 11 States involved in this disaster.

Our subcommittee held a hearing yesterday, during which the Surgeon General made a very strong and, I think we unanimously felt, a very good case for this authority. It is estimated by the Public Health Service, in these 177 counties affected, 117 water supplies were put out of commission, serving one and one-half million people, and hundreds of thousands of people are homeless. The Public Health Service has already used 70 gallons of typhoid serum. You may get some idea of how many people were immunized when I tell you that it takes just seven drops to immunize one person. Therefore this is a tremendous task and one of an emergency nature. The Public Health Service felt this could be done much quicker and more efficiently if, instead of the Public Health Service employing additional Federal employees to go into these 177 counties, this fund were used by making direct grants to the counties and permitting the counties to enlarge and expand such sanitation and health facilities as they already have.

It is estimated under this resolution that in the neighborhood of a million dollars will be necessary, and that it will take an expenditure of a thousand dollars a month for 6 months in each of the 177 counties. The authority in this resolution to employ people without regard to the civil service simply means where the Public Health Service has detailed some of its people to go to the flooded areas they may be permitted during the term of those employees being in the flooded areas to put someone in their places temporarily without making a permanent appointment from the civil-service register.

Mr. Speaker, that is the story. If there are any questions, I will try to answer them. If not, perhaps the gentleman from New York or someone on that side of the aisle would like to say something. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House discussing this matter. It has been very adequately presented to you by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. This is a real emergency in the interest of health and sanitation in the flood territory, and I believe we should send this resolution to the Senate just as soon as we can. We can have confidence in Surgeon General Parran, of the United States Public Health Service. He will see to it that all money allocated to him by this resolution is wisely, efficiently, and economically spent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that a similar emergency in his State was not provided for, may I say I am in heartiest agreement with him. If there was need in Pennsylvania under similar circumstances, of course it should have been taken care of. Provision should have been made for the alleviation of distress due to flood conditions at that time and I am at a loss to understand why it was not done.

But I am certain the gentleman does not want to be understood as taking the position that because human distress was not relieved on that occasion it is reason for failing to take care of this emergency. Whole cities are destitute and suffering. We are assured by the Surgeon General of the United States that death is certain to follow if this appropriation is not made available.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. RICH. If I had not thought this was worth while I would have objected in the first place, but I want to see this resolution passed; therefore I did not object. I think we should have had the same privileges for the people of Pennsylvania and New England last year that we are endeavoring to give these people. This is a deserving proposition, and I hope it will go through immediately.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I heartily agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he should have had assistance when it was needed, and I am glad to note that, notwithstanding our dereliction in that instance, he is supporting the passage of this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—CROP INSURANCE (H. DOC. NO. 150)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

During the past 4 years the Government has assisted farmers in meeting emergencies of two different types. The first was the collapse of prices resulting from huge surpluses for which foreign markets had disappeared. The second was widespread failure of crops resulting from drought.

Government action helped both farmers and consumers. Meanwhile again it has been shown that neither producers nor consumers are benefited by wide fluctuations in either prices or supplies of farm products.

Convinced that the time has come to take permanent steps to protect farmers and consumers against disasters of both types, I appointed, on September 19 last, a committee of representatives of Federal agencies and requested this committee to prepare a report and recommendations for legislation providing a plan of "all-risk" crop insurance.

The committee has now completed its work, and I transmit to you its report entitled "Report and Recommendations of the President's Committee on Crop Insurance." I have examined this report, and I am convinced that the plan it outlines is practical, socially desirable, and worthy of your thoughtful consideration.

I believe that it provides an adequate basis for legislation which will make possible a program of crop insurance applying to wheat for the crop year 1938. I believe that legislation should authorize application of similar programs to other commodities when it is established that producers desire them and application of the plan to wheat has provided a backlog of experience in applying the principles of crop insurance.

Crop insurance and a system of storage reserves should operate so that surpluses in years of good weather might be carried over for use in years of unfavorable growing conditions. Crop insurance and a system of storage reserves would help to protect the income of individual farmers against the hazards of crop failure; it would help to protect consumers against shortages of food supplies and against extremes of prices, and, finally, it would assist in providing a more nearly even flow of farm supplies, thus stabilizing farm buying power and contributing to the security of business and employment.

The Government also has a special interest in measures which would assist in guarding farmers and consumers against emergencies arising out of extremes of surpluses or shortages. The expense in the past to Federal, State, and local governments arising by reason of crop losses points to the desirability of employing the principle of insurance in order to lessen the cost—financial and human—of future crop disasters.

A program of crop insurance and storage of reserves should be part of the foundation of agricultural policy which we are building, and which must include the conservation of soil and water, better land use, increased farm income, and alleviation of distress in rural areas arising out of factors beyond the control of individual producers.

May I repeat what I have suggested in a former message: That because economic and social reforms of this character are essentially national in scope and in administration, the citizens of our Nation believe that our form of government was never intended to prohibit their accomplishment.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1937.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating in the RECORD a letter from John Bassett Moore on the pending neutrality bill, which I think will be informative to all Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that pertain to judicial reform?

Mr. DUNN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday I asked and received unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech of Governor Osborn in the house of representatives at Lansing, Mich. The Superintendent of Printing informs me it is three-quarters of a page longer than the maximum allowed under the rule, and I therefore renew my request.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what will be the cost to the Federal Government of inserting this speech that was made in Lansing, Mich.?

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. About $33 over the maximum

Mr. RICH. What will be the total amount?

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. One hundred and fifty-four dollars.

Mr. RICH. One hundred and fifty-four dollars to print the speech. I cannot object to the request, but it is a pretty big sum for inserting one speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall conclude not later than 4 o'clock this afternoon, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4720, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 40 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we bring to you the bill making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year 1938. The bill covers many activities and services. The Postal Establishment, which is provided for in this bill, is the largest organization of a business character in the world. We are pleased to point out that we have held the bill below the Budget estimates by $15,041,067, and if we eliminate from our summation the increase in the appropriation to build up the social-security reserve account, an actuarial item over which we have no control, we have held the bill below the Treasury and Post Office Departments' appropriations for the fiscal year 1937 by $99,851. In only one instance have we increased a Budget estimate and decreases in varying amounts have been made in more than one-third of the number of the estimates.

The grand total of appropriations carried in the bill is $1,500,955,151. The total of the Budget estimates for 1938 was $1,515,996,218. At the beginning of old-age security a table of annual increments to be added by way of appropriations to the old-age reserve account over a period of years was carefully worked out. The first increment, contained in the First Deficiency Act, 1936, was $265,000,000. The Budget item for that purpose in the fiscal year 1938 is $500,000,000, an increase of $235,000,000 over 1937, which explains the fact that the grand total of appropriations in the Treasury and Post Office bill for 1938 shows an increase of $234,900,149 over the 1937 bill.

SOUGHT TO PRACTICE ECONOMY

In preparing this bill our subcommittee has sought to practice the strictest economy consistent with the imperative needs of the two departments. The public service is never entirely stationary. As an appropriations subcommittee, we must recognize changing conditions and growth and progress, and yet with all due allowance for these variable factors, it has seemed to us that the condition of the times indicates retrenchment as a policy to be borne constantly in mind as an approach to the goal of a balanced Budget. We have used the pruning knife freely and in some instances have inserted it deeply, but always with an effort to be just and reasonable.

As one who is temporarily honored with the chairmanship of the subcommittee that prepares this great appropriation bill, I want to pause to extend my heartfelt thanks to the gentlemen with whom I am associated on that subcommittee for their splendid cooperation. I refer to Mr. BOYLAN, of New York; Mr. O'NEAL, of Kentucky; Mr. DALY, of Pennsylvania; Mr. HIGGINS, of Massachusetts; Mr. TABER, of New York; and Mr. DITTER, of Pennsylvania. Ours is a happy little family of coworkers, where partisan politics never enters to inject a jangling note and where decisions are reached solely on a basis of what we believe is the public interest. My fellow members of our subcommittee are all men of experience and vision, careful and practical. Mr. TABER, the ranking minority member, is also the ranking member on his side of the full Committee on Appropriations. For his sound advice and generous helpfulness all the way through I wish to express my deepest appreciation.

I have been so closely associated with Mr. TABER, and have been so impressed with his diligence, his fairness, his grasp of public problems, and his zeal in protecting the taxpayers that I cannot refrain from expressing the personal opinion that the Thirty-sixth District of New York made a real contribution to the service of the Nation when it sent Mr. TABER to Washington. And, of course, I need not dwell upon the indispensable services of our clerk, Mr. Sheild, because his superefficiency is known to all men.

CONSOLIDATIONS ARE OPPOSED

With your indulgence, I shall discuss some of the most important features of the bill, beginning with title I, the Treasury Department. Our subcommittee is faced every year with consolidations of estimates proposed by executive officials who present ingenious arguments for greater flexibility of spending authority. Two such consolidations were proposed in the 1938 estimates, one in the Coast Guard and the other in the Public Health Service, but the subcommittee adhered to its traditional opposition to such consolidations and denied them, believing that whatever advantage might accrue in an administrative way would be more than offset by the damage that would be done to the appropriating system of the Government by removing expenditures from the watchful control of the Congress. We believe in the wisdom of having a detailed break-down of all items that are submitted to the Appropriations Committee and the closest possible scrutiny by the committee in passing on the estimates. Whenever a consolidation is granted, the Congress, to just that extent, loses control of appropriations.

EMERGENCY ACTIVITIES

In our opinion, the time has come, in the interest of economy and orderly administration, when the emergency activities associated with the Treasury Department should begin to taper off sharply and drop out of the picture. As long as the set-up under the head of Emergency Banking, Gold Reserve, and Silver Purchase Acts is continued as a separate activity, it maintains on its roll personnel for various permanent and regular offices of the Department. In these circumstances we obtain a very inadequate idea of the personnel of any of these offices when we view its regular force, as it may have as many or more persons, besides funds for "other obligations", on the emergency banking, gold, and silver purchase roll. This presents a situation that is altogether confusing and unsatisfactory. We have undertaken the first step to unscramble this situation by effectuating a new set-up whereby the appropriation which each regular office has been carrying on the emergency roll is segregated in the bill and placed under the particular regular office to which it is attached.

This gives a clear picture at one glance of the emergency activity associated with each regular departmental office and also its regular appropriation, and we believe this presentation will be helpful toward an expeditious termination of temporary activities that should be wound up at the earliest possible date.

The item for reduction in the interest on farm mortgages, the very considerable amount of $24,000,000 in the 1937 bill, does not appear in this year's bill, having dropped out by statutory limitation.

PAYMENTS TO LAND BANK SURPLUSES

We reduced from $24,000,000 to $20,000,000 the Budget estimate of the appropriation to the paid-in surplus of the Federal land banks. The 5-year moratorium on principal payments on farm mortgages extends under statute until July 11, 1938, and meanwhile appropriations are made from the Federal Treasury to keep the surpluses of these banks intact. There will be an estimated unobligated balance in this fund amounting to $19,020,579 at the end of the present fiscal year, which will be a carry-over into the next fiscal year. This is the Treasury Department's estimate, but at the rate of expenditures during the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1937 a carry-over of as much as $24,000,000 would not be unexpected. This, together with the $20,000,000 appropriated in our bill, would give a total of $44,000,000 available to replenish these surpluses during the fiscal year 1938. Our belief in the entire adequacy of the appropriation allowed is fortified by the testimony of Governor Myers, of the Farm Credit Administration, who told of a continually improving situation in respect to repayment of farm loans.

The general picture—

shows that in the low of the depression in 1933 only about 40 percent of land-bank loans were in good condition. As of last December 31, 77.5 percent of the loans had all matured installments paid in full. In addition, 7.6 percent had payments extended, but had no delinquency in them, so that practically 85 percent of the loans were not delinquent as of that date, which is a very marked improvement since the summer of 1933.

CUSTOMS AND INTERNAL-REVENUE REFUNDS

It has been our observation that in the matter of refunds, both in the Customs Service and the Internal Revenue Service, the officials have aimed higher than the necessities of the Service require, and we reduced the refund estimates in both of those Services. For customs refunds we allowed $16,000,000, reducing the Budget estimate by $1,000,000. We were justified by experience in doing this, as customs refunds for the first 6 months of the current fiscal year are running at the rate of $15,034,000 per annum and the actual expenditures in 1936 were $15,723,000. For internal-revenue refunds we allowed $30,000,000, which is at the rate of expenditures so far in the present fiscal year. As the amount available for this purpose in the current year is $34,336,355 there is a prospect of a carry-over of several million dollars into the next fiscal year, giving assurance of ample funds to meet refund requirements in the next fiscal year.

The estimate for internal-revenue refunds in 1938 was $35,000,000, and we reduced this by $5,000,000 on apparently unimpeachable grounds, supported by the most abundant evidence that the amount allowed will be sufficient. The total appropriation allowed in this bill for the Internal Revenue Service is $87,798,920, an increase of $27,481,290 over the appropriation for the current fiscal year. The Social Security Act imposed enormous new tasks and duties on the Internal Revenue Bureau, which figure in this increase, although the increase is chiefly due to the fact that the appropriations for refunds was only $6,000,000 in 1937, due to a carry-over of $28,336,355 from the fiscal year 1936.

Appropriations allowed for the Coast Guard provide for continuation of the useful activities of that Service on practically the estimated basis, with $363,500 granted for the replacement of five airplanes and an allowance of $40,000 for worn-out cable replacement. Revival of business and of general activities is reflected in an increase of $1,171,570 in the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which we allowed in accordance with the detailed estimates.

PUBLIC-HEALTH APPROPRIATIONS

We approved estimates for the United States Public Health Service practically as submitted, allowing that Service $20,746,980, as against Budget estimates totaling $20,753,140 and this year's appropriation of $20,151,075. For diseases and sanitation investigations we allowed $1,600,000, as against $1,320,000 for the fiscal year 1937. There are 24 of these projects, including a new project for the study of chronic diseases, which appears in the estimates this year for the first time. For grants to States for public-health work we allowed $8,000,000, the full amount authorized by the Social Security Act.

One of the increases in the bill is $1,125,000 in the item of repairs, preservation, and equipment, public buildings, under the Procurement Division. The appropriation for this purpose in 1937 was $1,625,000, and for next year the amount allowed is $2,750,000. This increase is based on careful surveys and is due to the expanding program of occupancy of public buildings. The appropriation for 1937 applied to 2,269 buildings, while the 1938 appropriation will apply to 2,841 buildings.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe no public building program is carried in this bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. No. Those programs are never carried in this bill. They are carried in a separate measure under the deficiency subcommittee.

POSTAL SERVICE AND PROSPERITY

Coming now to title II of the bill, the Post Office Department, we find a picture that is pleasing to contemplate, a picture of returning prosperity as evidenced by expanding receipts and general increased business activities. A 5-year comparison will serve to show how postal business is improving. In the fiscal year 1934 the receipts were $586,000,000 and the expenditures were $632,000,000. For the fiscal year 1938 the estimated receipts are $755,000,000 and the total amount of appropriations for the Postal Service carried in this bill is $782,469,361. It is estimated that the income of the Postal Service in 1938 will be greater by $40,000,000 than the income in 1937.

The elimination of $26,500,000 for the subsidy to ocean mails has brought the budget of the Department close to the point where tongue and buckle meet; in other words, to the point where collections from postage and postal fees will meet the cost of the service rendered for hire. Of course, it is hardly to be conceived that there will be an actual balancing of the postal budget as long as the nonpostal items, frank and penalty mail, air-mail subsidy, and so forth, amounting to $40,000,000 a year, are charged to postal costs.

INCREASED PERSONNEL REQUIRED

The expanding volume of mail and increased postal activities require an increased personnel to handle the business, and additional space must be purchased in railroad trains to move the mails, and we have anticipated these requirements by raising the appropriations for the Post Office Department and the Postal Service from $780,584,589 in 1937 to $782,519,361 in 1938, an increase of $1,934,772. Represented in this increase are additional clerks, carriers, and messengers, and an increase of five in the force of inspectors.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. HAINES. I am very much interested in the statement the gentleman is making, and as the gentleman knows, I am a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and vitally interested in what he is discussing at this time.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. HAINES. I agree with the gentleman that the subcommittee has tried to do a good job and I compliment them on their work. I call the gentleman's attention to the appropriation for the Railway Mail Service, in which $250,000 is struck from the appropriation for the next fiscal year, which, as I understand, gives no opportunity for one additional employee in the Railway Mail Service. If we want to maintain this fine Service which we have built up, and these improvements that we have experienced in the past, does the gentleman think it wise to tie the Department's hands with this decrease in the appropriation?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that that particular item is not entirely closed. We are still seeking information in regard to that. The 1937 appropriation for salaries in the Railway Mail Service is $57,000,000. Expenditures for the first 4 months are at the rate of $56,330,000 for the entire fiscal year 1937. That, however, I state frankly, did not include the auxiliary service at Christmas time, and there is a possibility of some necessary extra service in connection with Valentine Day and in connection with the Easter mail, when the mails become appreciably heavier. We allow tentatively the Budget estimate of $56,750,000, pending further investigation of the matter. It may be a close figure. If so, there would be no injury to the Service, because supplementary appropriations might be provided, but at the same time I assure the gentleman that this very day we have that item under further consideration, and if the facts seem to warrant, we will not hesitate to revise that item.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that statement from the chairman of the subcommittee. I do not want him to feel that I am criticizing the work of his committee, because that is not my intention, but I do hope there will be some additional allowances given for this Railway Mail Service if we are to maintain the fine service that we have had in the past.

Mr. LUDLOW. I understand the gentleman's good faith in the matter and appreciate his kindly references to our subcommittee, which is trying sincerely to do a good job, and our estimate, as it appears in this bill, was based on the best information we had at the time the bill was written. We are now inquiring further into the matter in order to make an up-to-date check on it, and if the facts warrant, we will give this item further consideration.

We allowed $8,100,000 increase for clerks, $3,100,000 increase for carriers, and $875,000 increase in fees for special-delivery messengers. As the salaries of postmasters and assistant postmasters are automatically raised by increased receipts, we allowed $2,000,000 increase in pay of postmasters and $150,000 increase in pay of assistant postmasters to meet these statutory requirements. For transportation of mail by railroad routes and mail-messenger service we allowed $5,900,000 increase, raising that appropriation from $102,000,000 in 1937 to $107,900,000 in 1938. For vehicle service we allowed an increase of $266,000, and we increased the appropriations for operating force and operating supplies of public buildings a total of $2,625,000, based on the additional buildings that have to be cared for.

In the custodial service for public buildings under the Post Office and Treasury Departments there is a group of workers that is very much underpaid, and in this bill we have allowed $200,000 to be applied to correcting this condition. This money will be distributed administratively as long overdue promotions to the lower-paid deserving custodial employees. Many of those underpaid employees have families. Life has been with them a very hard struggle and the justice of their claims is beyond dispute.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. HAINES. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I refer back to the assistant postmasters, who had an allowance of $150,000, I believe, for additional assistance?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes. It is proposed to provide for 30 of these additional assistant postmasters. The Department asked for 60, and we allowed 30.

Mr. HAINES. My understanding is that there are 1,792 vacancies in the second-class post offices, where men are entitled to a promotion, and that by reason of lack of appropriation these men cannot have the benefit of promotions to which they are entitled.

Mr. LUDLOW. Does the gentleman mean promotions to place of assistant postmaster?

Mr. HAINES. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not know the exact figure. There are many vacancies in the assistant postmasterships, but there is a question in the administrative mind whether they need these filled. They propose to fill a small increment of them, and we have met them halfway on that.

Mr. HAINES. Is that all that the Department has asked for?

Mr. LUDLOW. They asked for 60 additional. There is provision also for increased pay for assistant postmasters, based on the receipts of their offices.

Mr. HAINES. They did not say anything to the committee about the 1,792 promotions of men who are eligible for promotion?

Mr. LUDLOW. There was a general discussion about the number of vacancies in the office of the Assistant Postmaster General. I do not think the point the gentleman makes was brought out, but many of those places where there are vacancies in the office of the Assistant Postmaster get along fairly well now, and times are hard, and the taxpayers are hard pressed, and we did not think, and the Department did not think, we ought to go ahead and provide for filling all those vacancies.

Mr. HAINES. That is the statement I wanted from the gentleman, and I thank him.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I should like to complete my general statement, and then I shall be glad to yield later.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Can the gentleman give us some idea as to when we shall return to 2-cent postage?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in my judgment not so long as the present administration of the Post Office Department continues, because the Post Office Department as at present constituted is very strongly opposed to returning to 2-cent postage. The claim is made that a return to universal 2-cent postage would cause a loss of $100,000,000 a year in revenue based on estimates and surveys that have been made by the Post Office Department; and the Department is unalterably opposed to any change in the postage rate on first-class mail.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I take it, then, we are due to have 3-cent postage during the rest of this administration at least.

Mr. LUDLOW. If the gentleman will indulge a personal thought about the matter, I may say that I think the Department has not made sufficient calculation of the probable increase in the bulk of mail that would be occasioned if we returned to 2-cent postage, and that their estimate of loss is too high; but this is just my own thought about the matter.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in this bill provision is made for the first time for the establishment of trans-Atlantic air mail on regular schedules. This is in a sense an epochal event and a subject of intriguing interest. The time has come in the evolution of the factors of world progress and the development of agencies for human convenience when it seems to be accepted as a foregone conclusion that this service should be established.

While the trans-Atlantic item included in this bill is concerned only with carrying the mails, it is reasonable to contemplate it as the fulcrum for ushering in great possibilities of passenger and express service, as well as the quickening of mail transportation, since the enormous planes that will carry the mail overseas will also transport passengers and express. If this appropriation is approved, the tenth year following the flight of the Lone Eagle to Paris will witness the beginning of a regular trans-Atlantic air and passenger service with four round trips or eight single passages a week, carrying mail, passengers, and freight between America and England. I hope I may be pardoned if I indulge a personal reference at this point. When it fell to my lot as president of the National Press Club in 1927 to introduce Colonel Lindbergh to an immense and wildly enthusiastic audience at the National Capital on the night of his return from his historic flight to Paris, I little dreamed that a brief decade would usher in the establishment of regular air mail and passenger service across the Atlantic, or that it would be my privilege and duty as a Member of Congress to report an appropriation for that purpose. With these modern argosies of the skies, vehicles of transport and carriers of intelligence, operating on regular schedules between landing fields at New York or some other Atlantic seaport and London, we may well say that the genius of our aviators has accomplished marvelous results in overcoming the vast stretches of treacherous ocean and bringing the two hemispheres close together.

Under provisions of this bill trans-Atlantic air-mail service will start with an appropriation of $750,000 for that part of the fiscal year 1937–38 when this service is expected to be in operation. The development of the trans-Atlantic air program, of which this is the beginning, has been a matter of slow growth, featured by numerous international conferences. During the last year a number of missions came over from foreign countries to discuss the problem with officials of our Government. Second Assistant Postmaster General Harllee Branch, Assistant Secretary of State Walton Moore, and representatives of the Department of Commerce and the Army and the Navy sat in at these conferences. There were missions from Britain, France, Germany, and the Netherlands, made up chiefly of officials of the communications departments of the various countries.

FOUR ROUND TRIPS A WEEK

The negotiations between the British and our American officials early took the lead among these pourparlers and reached a climax when an understanding was arrived at on a practical working arrangement for the establishment and operation of trans-Atlantic air mail on a strictly reciprocal basis. It is to carry into effect this 50–50 compact between the two great English-speaking nations that the initial appropriation is carried in this bill. The plan provides that America shall operate two trans-Atlantic round trips a week and the British shall operate the same number, making four round trips per week, half of which will be a British service and half of which will be a United States service. The termini of the two services will be landing fields at New York and London. There will be two contracts. We will have our own contract with a United States contractor for service going from this country and the British are going to have a similar amount of service with a British contractor—two round trips a week from their country over here. On their return trip to America the American airships will bring British mail, bearing British stamps, the receipts of which will belong to Britain, and vice versa the British airships on their return trip from America to London will take American mail, with American stamps affixed, the receipts of which will belong to America.

The poundage will be weighed in each instance and the money transaction between the two countries will be measured by the difference in poundage. In other words, neither country will hold back mail for its own ships to carry, both sides being agreed that in the interest of the utmost expeditiousness mail shall be dispatched on the first ship that goes out.

The American trans-Atlantic air mail will be flown over two routes known, respectively, as the northern and the southern routes.

The distance by the northern route from New York to London via Shediac, Nova Scotia, and Ireland is 3,418 miles. The step-off from Newfoundland to Ireland is a sheer distance of 2,000 miles over water, without any landing places. By the southern route the distance from New York to London is about 5,000 miles, but the hazard of flight is relieved by numerous landing places. The various legs of this flight are as follows: New York to Bermuda, 773 miles; Bermuda to Azores, 2,067 miles; Azores to Lisbon, 1,050 miles; Lisbon to Gironde, 609 miles; Gironde to London, 500 miles; total, 4,999 miles.

SOUTHERN ROUTE THE BEST

The northern route, it will be seen, is the shorter of the two routes by more than 1,500 miles, but the safety factors are on the side of the southern route, and will be until more experience has been acquired in combating storms and ice in the high northern altitudes. Until such time, therefore, it is expected that most of the flying will be by the southern route, which is safe at all seasons of the year. The scheduled time for making the flight by the northern route will be between 24 and 30 hours and by the southern route between 36 and 40 hours. When we recall that the fastest steamships—the Queen Mary and Normandie—consume 4 days and 20 hours making the trans-Atlantic trip from port to port, we have an idea of the extent to which the new air service will quicken mail, passenger, and express transportation.

INITIAL APPROPRIATION, $750,000

To maintain the trans-Atlantic service as thus described on a basis of full performance would require an appropriation of about $1,800,000 a year from the United States Treasury. Theoretically, this would provide for 6 months flying each year by the northern route and 6 months by the southern, but as already stated it is expected that on account of meteorological conditions and pending further experience, most of the flying will be by the southern route.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. While New York, as the gentleman states, has been designated the western terminus, yet on account of weather and other conditions that may arise other cities along the eastern seaboard have been designated, too, have they not?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is true. It is expected that New York will be the main terminus on this side of the Atlantic, but Charleston, in the gentleman's State, and Baltimore, in Maryland, have been designated as alternative termini dependent on weather and other conditions. It may be that part of the service will operate from Charleston and part from Baltimore.

Mr. McMILLAN. And because of meteorological and other conditions to which the gentleman has referred, this service as well may be conducted out of some of these other cities the gentleman mentioned as out of New York.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think that is undoubtedly true, and I am glad the gentleman makes this contribution to the discussion, because the Post Office Department has in mind these additional seaport cities as possible termini in certain exigencies, meteorological or otherwise.

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say for the information and benefit of the gentleman from Indiana that my city has already undertaken the laying out of airport and other facilities to provide for this service.

Mr. LUDLOW. The Budget Bureau submitted an estimate of $1,208,640 to enable the United States to function on its end of the American-Anglo agreement during the last 8 months of the fiscal year 1938, beginning on November 1 next. That estimate was based on 100 percent frequencies from the beginning.

We reduced the amount to $750,000, basing our action on the well-known fact that such enterprises are slow and gradual in starting. We also had before us the object lesson of the trans-Pacific air-mail service, where the initial appropriation proved to be excessive, due to the fact that it was quite a while before the service reached the stage of 100-percent performance. With frequencies likely to be uncertain for a time, we believe we have allowed all the money that will be required to put the trans-Atlantic service on a going basis during the next fiscal year, even if it should start promptly on November 1 as planned.

In our belief that we have provided sufficient funds to begin the service, we are fortified by the testimony of First Assistant Postmaster General W. W. Howes (p. 245 of the hearings):

> When this operation starts out, it probably will not develop very fast right away—

He said—

> because it will be experimental, and the frequency may not be as regular to start with as it will be when it is finally developed.

Two departments of the Government—the Post Office Department and the State Department—are deeply interested in the establishment of this trans-Atlantic air service. It also is cordially approved by the War Department, which sees nothing objectionable in it from a national-defense standpoint. As an argument against delay it is contended that it would be in the interest of America to close the matter at once while it has British acquiescence.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. What is the loss the Government sustains in the furnishing of this air-mail service of which he is now speaking?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. To what extent does the Government have to subsidize the transportation of mail across the ocean?

Mr. LUDLOW. A change is now taking place because of an act that passed the last Congress transferring mail from a subsidized merchant-marine service to a regular poundage basis. Formerly it was heavily subsidized. As I recall it we were paying $26,500,000 under the merchant marine act and on a poundage basis the mail is being carried for $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. There is a differential between the two systems of something like $23,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. That it is costing the Government to maintain the service?

Mr. LUDLOW. No longer, because at the present time we have begun operations under the new merchant marine act. Theretofore there was a heavy subsidy borne by the Mail Service.

It is pointed out that the United States has no way to send air mail to Europe now, or at any time in the future, unless Britain allows it to get there, as the termini and intermediate landing points are controlled by the British. This is true as to Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Ireland on the northern route and Bermuda and the Azores on the southern route. The Azores are Portuguese territory, but conceded to be under the British sphere of influence.

DEPARTMENT IS ENTHUSIASTIC

The Post Office Department visualizes immediate success for the service and a complete fulfillment of expectations in a big way. Whether or not its optimism is well founded remains to be seen, but certainly all of the factors of success seem to be in the equation. The air-mail postage rate proposed for trans-Atlantic mail is 25 cents per letter of one-half ounce and 25 cents additional for each half ounce or fraction thereof. This compares with the existing mail rate of 5 cents an ounce and 3 cents for each additional half ounce on mail sent by steamboat to foreign countries. The service contemplates the use of air mail all the way from point of origin to point of destination. That is to say, if a citizen of Indianapolis desires the service of trans-Atlantic air mail to London, his letter would go via air mail from Indianapolis to New York and by air mail from the landing point on British soil to London.

Based on close calculations of the prospective volume of mail, the Department predicts that at the 25-cent rate, the revenues would pay the contractual obligations at $2 per mile and the service would be self-sustaining from the start, which would differentiate it very markedly from the air service to China which, although it has been in operation since November 22, 1935, still registers a big annual deficit.

The picture of the trans-Atlantic air mail that is in the minds of the Post Office Department officials visualizes London as the funnel through which air mail from all over Europe will be gathered and sent to America.

On the other hand, New York is visualized as the funnel through which mail coming from the Orient, all countries in the Western Hemisphere, north of Brazil, and all of the United States will pass on the way to London and points in Europe. From Hong Kong to San Francisco is 6 days by the China Clipper service; from San Francisco to New York is 1 day by fast plane, and from New York to London will be 30 hours, so that mail from Hong Kong crossing North America will reach London in 8 or 9 days by trans-Atlantic air mail.

BASIS OF COMPETITIVE BIDS

The contract for carrying the trans-Atlantic mail at a maximum cost of $2 a mile will be awarded on the basis of competitive bids. It is probable that the service would start with the four-engine clippers that pioneered the Pacific, but testimony before our subcommittee described plans for constructing enormous new ships for this trans-Atlantic service, one of 60 tons and one of 125 tons.

The China Clipper ships now in operation are about 25 or 26 tons, with a wing spread of 130 feet. The new ships will be immensely larger. It will be written into the contract that all airships used in this American Postal Service must be built in America and that the contractor shall employ only Americans.

The Post Office Department and the State Department believe after exhaustive investigations that trans-Atlantic air mail will be very profitable and desirable from the standpoint of America. The postal appraisal of the project was stated by First Assistant Postmaster General Howes as follows:

In my opinion, there is nothing in the world, from the mail-carrying standpoint, that has any better potentialities for heavy business than this route from the east coast of the United States to Europe. That is naturally a heavy mail operation, as is shown by the ocean mail now.

NEW ALASKA AND SOUTH AMERICAN SERVICE

We also authorized three increments to our foreign air-mail service, including a second weekly flight on route 10 from Para by Maranho, Pernambuco, Bahia, and Victoria to Rio de Janeiro, 2,477.8 miles and return. The Budget estimate of the cost of this service was $386,537, but we believe the service can be secured at a much lower rate, since performance is now going on without Government aid from the revenue derived from passengers and express. We have allowed $200,000 for this desirable air-mail service and hope that a satisfactory arrangement can be effected with the contractor on that basis.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. I do not understand clearly whether the Post Office Department or the Government is to purchase these ships or whether they are to be privately owned.

Mr. LUDLOW. They will be privately owned. They will be furnished by the contractor the same as is done now, not by the Air Mail Service.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Has any provision been made or any door left open for lighter-than-air ships?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman refers to dirigibles?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that that matter was never submitted to the subcommittee by any person, but since the bill was reported it has been brought to my attention by several Members on the floor who feel that dirigibles should not be excluded. I find by referring to the Air Mail Act that the appropriation could not be made in this bill because it is specifically provided in the Air Mail Act that air mail must be carried by airplanes. Furthermore, I took the matter up with the Post Office Department officials, Mr. Harllee Branch, Second Assistant Postmaster General, and it is the belief of the officials of that Department, concurred in I understand by the State Department, that it would virtually wreck this particular proposal to provide for dirigible service for the reason that it has all been oriented around airplanes.

It must be borne in mind that this is not an exclusive undertaking on the part of the United States. It is a cooperative undertaking with England, and the whole arrangement has been fashioned around the airplane. Furthermore, it is provided in the Air Mail Act that the maximum pay for carrying the mail shall be $2 a mile. No dirigible on earth could carry the mail at any such rate; therefore, as the legislation stands now this would automatically exclude the dirigibles. However, I want to make these statements without prejudice against the dirigible, but I am firmly of the belief it could not be articulated in with this particular program. If it is the desire to go ahead with the promotion of the dirigible in this connection, it should be taken up in a legislative way by the enactment of a new law that would cover the situation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I have several questions to ask the gentleman about several of these appropriations. Will there be an opportunity at the close of his address for me to ask him questions as to certain items in this appropriation bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. I should like to finish my address first. I will yield to the gentleman if he has detailed questions, and they may be taken up, I am sure, under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I am seeking information from the committee and its chairman, and I should like to know at this time if there will be opportunity at the close of the gentleman's address to ask him questions and receive information.

Mr. LUDLOW. I will answer the questions to the best of my ability.

This appropriation would provide an additional flight a week down the east coast of South America to the populous districts of southern Brazil around Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, and Santos. It has heretofore been once a week. The service will expedite business correspondence, as well as other important correspondence, something like a week. Testimony before our subcommittee was that our businessmen are patronizing the South American air mail freely; that it is growing rapidly; that it is justifying itself and is proving very useful in developing business and promoting friendly relations.

I may say I had a very interesting conversation with Mr. Secretary Hull on that point. He had just returned from South America and he is most enthusiastic over the value of this service to our country.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. The gentleman states we are carrying this on a sort of cooperative basis with England?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman is speaking about the trans-Atlantic service. I was discussing the South American air-mail service.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I am referring back to the trans-Atlantic air-mail service. Does England bear the same measure of loss as the United States in connection with this matter?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have not seen the agreement, but I understand they are in every respect exactly on a par. It is reciprocal in every way, and the service is identical. The obligations are identical. Their service will be rendered by the Imperial Airways, which is the outstanding British aviation company engaged in foreign air service.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. And relatively their loss will be the same as ours?

Mr. LUDLOW. As I understand it, the whole thing is on a basis of absolute equality.

We also allowed $17,415 for shuttle service once a week from Arica, Chile, to La Paz, Bolivia, 197 miles to connect the main route of the Pan American line on the west coast of South America with Bolivia. This service is justified from the standpoint of international relations and commercial prospects.

The other increment of foreign air mail approved is a line from Juneau, by Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, and Tanacross, to Fairbanks, Alaska, the appropriation allowed being $68,692 for service, one round trip a week. The distance between the termini—Juneau and Fairbanks—is 660.5 miles. In Alaska and the Pacific Northwest there has long been a great and insistent demand for Alaska air-mail service. Mr. DIMOND, the able Delegate from Alaska, has been most persistent and convincing in his advocacy of Alaska air mail. On account of terrain and meterological conditions, it is obvious that if Alaska, a territory of vast and unfathomable riches, is ever to be developed at all, air mail must be drawn upon heavily for that development. Our subcommittee, in approving this comparatively inexpensive service from Juneau to Fairbanks, believes it will function in the public interest and will be the means of some valuable pioneering work, which will show more clearly a year or two hence how important a part air mail will have in the further development of Alaska.

DOMESTIC AIR MAIL

For domestic air-mail service during the fiscal year 1938 we have granted the full estimate of $14,250,000. The appropriation for 1937 was $12,000,000, but already a deficiency of $984,000 has been allowed. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rates paid to the domestic air-mail contractors, and it has granted many increases which are reflected in the estimate. The amount we have allowed for 1938 to operate the contract air mail will maintain all existing services and schedules and will provide $400,000 for about 1,800 miles of new routes and extensions. This mileage will be divided in the proportion of about 10 percent for extensions and 90 percent for new routes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

This will allow the establishment of new routes totaling about 1,620 miles. In addition to this new service the sum of $770,954.40 will be available to increase frequencies on present routes and schedules. This concludes the more important items of the bill. We believe we have brought to you a bill that is not only economical but constructive and forelooking. We believe that it stands for progress, but at the same time protects in every proper way the rights and interests of the taxpayers.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. On page 28 of the bill, under the item of "Bureau of Engraving and Printing", I find an appropriation of $7,500,000 for the maintenance of that Bureau. This is a bureau, as I understand it, that prints and engraves Federal Reserve notes and the currency which goes into circulation in this country?

Mr. LUDLOW. It also prints postage stamps, revenue stamps, and other stamps, Government bonds, and general Government securities.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I understand the Federal Reserve banks pay for this service at the rate of 35 cents a thousand dollars of currency. I note in the report on this bill there is an increase of $1,171,570 over the expense incurred last year. I am wondering what brings about the need for that increase?

Mr. LUDLOW. This is based on an increased volume of work. This has been very closely estimated and, according to our best judgment, we thought it was entirely justified. They are trying to build up a reserve there, as I understand it, and the increased volume of the general business of the country requires many different stamps. The printing of postage stamps has been largely increased; revenue stamps have also largely increased, and the great volume of additional work due to the increase and revival of business and returning prosperity is reflected in that item.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is not one of the reasons for the large expense of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing due to the practice of bank tellers all over the country retiring currency that is a little bit soiled and sending it back to the Treasury Department?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not believe the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has anything to do with that. That is a Treasury item.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Under the practice being followed for the issuance of currency, I find also on the next page an item under the heading of "Secret Service" for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, and so forth, of $790,000. That is an expense the Government is bearing, as I understand it, to protect these Federal Reserve notes that are issued and put into circulation by the Federal Reserve banks, and they are the chief beneficiaries?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the appropriation for the maintenance of the Secret Service is to protect the people of the United States against counterfeiting.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. It is for the definite purpose of protecting the Federal Reserve bank from counterfeiting. There is no return to the Government from those Federal Reserve notes except the cost of printing, which is said to be 35 cents a thousand dollars of currency. Does not the gentleman think under the circumstances when we are paying $7,000,000 to maintain the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and this Secret Service organization that it is expensive and excessive?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman, with all due respect, we are simply an appropriating committee. If I understand the gentleman's viewpoint, he complains of matters that are governed by substantive law, and we have nothing to do with them in an appropriation bill. The gentleman should take up any matter of legislation to be embodied in the bill with the appropriate legislative committee.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it the gentleman's contention that the members of the Appropriations Committee should not scrutinize these items when they bring in an appropriation bill that calls for an increase of $1,000,000 in an appropriation?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that we scrutinized every item in the bill with the greatest care. [Applause.]

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. THOM. In the allocation of moneys for the old-age reserve fund, I believe the sum is $500,000,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. Correct.

Mr. THOM. How does that compare with the estimated income from the beneficiaries and employers for the year?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman I do not think anybody on the face of the earth could tell that. It was brought out that this was simply a stab in the dark. They have to build up, under statutory requirements, an old-age reserve account, and they have estimated, perhaps blindly, what the annual increments must be. They follow, however, very closely the estimate of the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee of the Senate, which prepared a table of annual increments when this legislation was enacted. I think they follow exactly the estimate of the Senate Finance Committee, deviating somewhat from the Ways and Means Committee estimate, because there were certain changes made in the bill after it was sent to the Senate. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the remarks I am about to make and the task I have assigned myself are about the most difficult I have ventured to undertake since I have been in Congress; to talk upon the Court issue, as far as humanly possible, from a nonpartisan point of view. To do so I must put a soft pedal on my own pronounced views and speak with mufflers.

A good many years ago, back in 1912, I left the Republican Party on a matter of principle because I thought Theodore Roosevelt had been robbed of a nomination. As I look back upon it, it was a picayune and a trifling issue compared with what Members of Congress are now confronted with, and particularly, those on the majority side; and I think I have some right, as one who has at times differed with the leadership of my party while in Congress, to speak on this issue, not for the purpose of attacking the President, not even for impugning his motives or his intentions, but for the purpose, as I go along, of trying to explode certain myths that have been presented to the public by skillful propaganda.

At the outset of my remarks I want to make the following statement:

I do not believe that the flame of liberty has burned so low and the love of our free institutions and constitutional government has so waned that Members of Congress will deliberately, by their votes, destroy the independence and impartiality of the Supreme Court and make it a sounding board and a rubber stamp to register the edicts and the decrees of the President, be he a Republican or a Democrat, be he the best or the worst Chief Executive. Any Representative who votes to pack the Court by six additional Justices will be a marked man as long as he lives.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I would rather proceed for a while without interruption.

This issue is the most vital and far reaching affecting our form of government since the Civil War and, possibly, since the formation of the Constitution itself.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is reading from something and has failed to give us the benefit of knowing what document he is reading from. If they are the gentleman's own remarks, I would like to know it.

Mr. FISH. They are my own remarks and constitute a brief introduction to my main purpose of exposing the myths in connection with the Court issue. It is not for me to advise Democrats how to vote. I have always said that Democrats are just as loyal to our free institutions and constitutional government as Republicans.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Member is not speaking to the legislation under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. We are in general debate, which allows every possible latitude.

Mr. FISH. Republicans and Democrats served shoulder to shoulder in the World War to make the world safe for democracy. Now, even Raymond Moley says this is a blow aimed at the very heart of democratic institutions and makes the President the master of the Supreme Court. If Democratic Members of Congress want to vote to commit political suicide that is their concern and not mine. I predict, however, that practically every Democrat from the South will be opposed, and rightly so, within his own party if he votes to impair or destroy constitutional government, and, certainly, those in many sections of the North and West will be replaced by Republicans.

If I could put my partisanship above my faith in our three separate and independent branches of government and in the Constitution, I would be delighted to have the President put through his program to pack the Court, for it would be a tragic political blunder, and would poison the minds of the people against President Roosevelt, in whom they have so recently shown their confidence and trust.

It must be evident to all that the independence of the Supreme Court would be immediately destroyed and that the Court would lose the respect of the people if the President's plan to pack the Court is adopted by Congress. The Congressmen who support it at the President's bidding would never hear the end of it, and I believe the adoption of the President's program would do more to restore the confidence of the people in the Republican Party than anything that that party could do itself.

Where did the President's proposal originate? With whom did he confer? With what Congressmen? Who is the mother and who is the father of the plan to increase the Court by six new members? What is its parentage? Is it a bastard child of unknown parents? Did the President confer only with Prof. Felix Frankfurter and Donald Richberg, as reported in the press? There is nothing in the Democratic platform about the proposed rape of the Supreme Court, but there is a reference to clarifying constitutional amendments and that is the proper way to rectify defects in the Constitution.

I propose to try to explode a number of myths that have been built up through skillful propaganda in support of the President's plan, both in the press and over the radio. Among these myths are those dealing with the delay on constitutional amendments, the age of the Justices, the attitude of Abraham Lincoln, trying to make the issue one between liberals and conservatives instead of between liberals and radicals, the statement of Representative MAVERICK that the protests from back home are inspired by the same type of propaganda as that during the consideration of the utilities-control bill, and, above all, that the rights of free speech and of radicals and minorities are not consistently upheld by the Supreme Court.

Let us take up, first, the myth that has been developed about the delay in adopting constitutional amendments. I happen to be one of those Members of Congress belonging to the liberal element on the Republican side that favors constitutional amendments. I would favor a number of constitutional amendments on this particular subject involving the Supreme Court. I would be prepared to vote for an amendment to limit the ages of the Justices to 70 years or preferably 75 years, if the people back home wanted it done. I would be prepared now—and I would like to see my party do it—to advocate an amendment to the Constitution enabling Congress to enact minimum-wage laws for men, women, and children. One of the reasons given by the President for his drastic proposal is the invalidation by the Court through a 5-to-4 decision of the minimum-wage law of New York State. I say in all sincerity, with absolute conviction, I would favor an amendment to the Constitution, or rather I would vote for such a resolution in the House to submit an amendment to the people for their decision enabling Congress to overrule the Supreme Court on 5-to-4 decisions by a two-thirds vote.

I believe that would be a conservative proposition, because the people back home, like many of us, are disturbed by these 5-to-4 decisions. They are unpopular, they undermine the confidence and respect of the people in the Court. Therefore, because I believe in the Court I would like to see an amendment go through, if the people wanted it, to permit the Congress to override 5-to-4 decisions by a two-thirds vote just the way a veto of the President is overridden or by the same method and vote that a constitutional amendment is initiated by Congress.

I believe that the people are the masters of the Constitution, the masters of the Congress and of the President, that if anything is wrong with the Constitution, if there is any defect, then it can be remedied and corrected in one way, by a constitutional amendment, adopted by a two-thirds vote of the Congress and submitted to the people back home for their ratification by three-quarters of the State legislatures.

That is the essence of popular government, that is having faith in the people, and that is what I believe most of the American people themselves believe in, and, above all, that is what liberals believe in. They are opposed to autocracy, they are opposed to concentrating too much power in the hands of any one individual. They believe in the three separate and independent branches of the Government and in our representative and constitutional Government itself. Liberalism is the extension of democratic processes of government and the right of the people to rule.

Let us look at the record in answer to the charges made that you cannot put through within a reasonable time a constitutional amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I would rather not, now.

The twelfth amendment was adopted in 9 months; the thirteenth amendment was adopted in less than a year; the fifteenth amendment in a little more than a year; the seventeenth amendment in just over a year; the eighteenth amendment in just over a year; the nineteenth amendment in 14 months; the twentieth in 11 months; the twenty-first in less than a year. This is conclusive evidence, utterly undeniable, that the American people can act when they want to act within a reasonable time and generally within a year. If the President had sent in a proposed amendment to the Democratic-controlled Congress when the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional that amendment could have been ratified back home by this time if the people wanted to ratify it. The reason many of us are opposed to this procedure is not that we are not in favor of progressive legislation but because it is an un-American and undemocratic way of doing it. It is because it destroys the independence of the Court and destroys the confidence of the people in the Court, and makes it nothing but a rubber stamp to carry out the decisions of the President.

But that is not the only reason, because you attempt to do something that is apparently constitutional but which actually violates the spirit of the Constitution by putting new judges on the bench to interpret the Constitution, not as written, but the way some one man wants it interpreted in an unconstitutional manner. So much for that one particular myth as to not being able in reasonable time to pass a constitutional amendment. The Supreme Court is the living voice of the Constitution to maintain its supremacy, and a government by law and the people can change or amend the Constitution.

Let us now take up another myth, the question of the ages of the Justices. If the President is right, if his logic and reasoning are sound, then when he says that men over 70 years of age are superannuated, that they are disqualified on account of age and incompetent to sit on the highest tribunal, in spite of the experience of the past, when practically all our Chief Justices were over 70 years of age before retiring, then by the same token the Members of the House who are over 70 are superannuated and incompetent to serve their districts. Without desiring to be personal, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is in his seventieth year, that the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means is well beyond his seventieth year.

If the President's logic is correct, then these districts so represented here in Congress should elect additional Members to serve alongside the sitting Members in order that these districts may be properly represented. If the President is correct, then there should be two more members of the Cabinet to help out the Secretary of the Navy as one who is well over 70, and the Secretary of Commerce, who is in his seventieth year. If the President is correct, then the Vice President of the United States should retire from office before his term has expired or we should elect an additional Vice President. So there is no use going further into the ages of the various Members of the House or the Senate except to say that in the other body some of the most outstanding and brilliant Members, some of the most active and aggressive, are well beyond the age of 70. I refer to Senator BORAH, a liberal; Senator NORRIS, a liberal; and Senator GLASS, a conservative. So much for that myth that those over 70 years of age are superannuated and not qualified to hold public office.

Now, let us discuss some other myths. I am not impugning the President's motives for the sake of partisanship—I admit that he is the most skillful politician in America. I admit that he knows more about building up public opinion and broadcasting propaganda than any one man who has sat in the White House for many years [applause]; and I admit further that if he can make the people back home believe that this is an issue between conservatives and liberals that his program will go through. If he can succeed in making that issue and placing the American Liberty League, the big taxpayers, and the big bankers before the people as leading the fight against his court program, and succeed in his attempts to make out to the people that this is a conservative against a liberal proposal, he will win and will control the Court. The liberals, however, headed in the other body by Senators BORAH, JOHNSON, WHEELER, GEORGE, and FRAZIER, and in whose ranks are numbered many other liberal Senators of distinction, do not propose to permit any such issue to come before the American people.

I believe, for one, that this is an issue between conservatives and liberals as against radicals, Communists, and Socialists; that it is a direct issue between those radical forces that have no faith in the Constitution, that would like to undermine it, and the liberals who have faith in our Constitution and in the Supreme Court. The liberals believe that the Constitution is the greatest charter of human liberty ever conceived by the mind of man. They believe the Constitution is the palladium of American liberties, that it is what makes for our rights and liberties as free, sovereign people, that it is the barrier and the bulwark against the autocracies and dictatorships of the Old World, including fascism, nazi-ism, and communism. As Al Smith justly says, "It is the civil bible of America" that protects the rights and liberties of the minorities, racial and religious, foreign-born and Negro.

The colored people have more at stake in maintaining the Constitution instead of destroying the independence of the Supreme Court than any single group in America today. Only recently the Supreme Court acted and saved the lives of a number of young Negro boys condemned to death in a Southern State probably because of the agitation of Communists in their behalf that had roused unfavorable public opinion. Yet, to protect the lives of these colored boys, the Supreme Court of the United States stepped into the breach—in the Scottsboro case. Yet, efforts are being made to make the Supreme Court appear as the enemy of the poor man, thus undermining the confidence of the people in the Court, whereas the Court has been the guardian of the people's liberty, including freedom of speech, of assembly of the press, and of trial by jury.

More recently in an Oregon case a Communist had been sentenced to 7 years imprisonment under a syndicalist law of the State of Oregon because he had made some statement that was thought to be critical of our institutions.

Mr. PIERCE. No, no; he just presided at the meeting.

Mr. FISH. Because he spoke.

Mr. PIERCE. No; he only presided at the meeting.

Mr. FISH. Well, he spoke if he presided. He spoke at some meeting in Portland, Oreg. He was an American citizen and he spoke at some meeting. The court held him liable under an antiquated syndicalist law. The Supreme Court again stepped into the breach and upheld the right to freedom of speech by a unanimous vote.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMACK. There was no incendiary act or expression on the part of this man. He merely attended a meeting of Communists. Attendance at such meeting was declared to be a crime and, of course, the Supreme Court acted correctly in that case.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman.

Now, one of the proponents of this bill, notably Governor Earle of the State of Pennsylvania, made a speech the other day in Springfield, Ill., on Lincoln's Birthday, using Lincoln's name and memory, and saying he would have done likewise and would have supported the present program to control the Court.

That was a slur and slander upon Abraham Lincoln. He would never have joined in any program to destroy the independence of the Supreme Court. Abraham Lincoln had faith in the people. He said, Tell the people the truth and the country is safe. Even in his first inaugural address a good part of it was given over to the statement that if anything is wrong with the Constitution then amendments should be submitted to the people, who should decide the issues themselves. Lincoln had a profound faith in the people. Lincoln believed the Constitution was all the law and the prophets. Lincoln, it is true, disagreed with the Dred Scott decision, but he did not resist it. He did not try to destroy the Court. But he did favor amendments to the Constitution because he believed that the people back home were the masters of the Constitution and they could do whatever they wanted. That is an entirely different kind of doctrine. That is another myth that should be exploded.

The only argument the proponents of the President's Court program offer so far as delay is concerned is the child-labor amendment, which has been pending since 1924. That resolution was passed by a Republican Congress by a two-thirds vote 13 years ago. It has not been ratified as yet. I voted for the resolution, but I believe it was badly drawn, and I thought so at the time. It is too wide in scope and goes too far. That is the reason why it has not been adopted before this time. However, I am for it and sent a telegram recently to the Kansas State Senate, and I propose sending a similar telegram to the New York State Assembly, controlled by Republicans, to be read at the hearing next Monday. I am pointing out it is not only a just and humanitarian measure, but, if the Republicans block ratification, they are playing into the hands of the President of the United States, who is trying to pack the Supreme Court and will use the ammunition that the Republicans afford him as an excuse for his hasty, unwarranted, and unreasonable action.

Let us see what other myths we have. The President in his message to Congress says the docket of the Supreme Court is way behind; yet his Attorney General and Solicitor General come out with a statement saying that the docket is clear, that the Supreme Court is up-to-date with its business. In addition eight Federal judges have not been appointed by the President in district and circuit courts and some of the vacancies having existed for more than a year. These facts should be sufficient to explode the myth about the delay in Federal courts, for if anyone is to blame it is the President himself for withholding appointments. The proposed increase of six members on the Supreme Court will delay rather than expedite justice and consideration of cases before the Court. I happen to come from the President's district and I think it might interest the House to know how the people of that district feel about the Court proposal. I am receiving all kinds of letters in spite of the amazing myth that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] is trying to develop, that the letters and telegrams we are receiving as Members of Congress are similar to those that we received when the public utility control bill was before the House for consideration, which obviously were inspired by the utility companies, as we found out regretfully later on.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a statement of fact?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The congressional officers from Minnesota are receiving identically printed slips in green, yellow and blue, opposing the passage of this bill, which are inspired by the same forces that last year tried to defeat Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. FISH. Of course, I do not know any more than does the gentleman where they came from, but they were probably inspired by those who favored the President's program, because anybody who sends out blue, yellow, red, and green slips is doing a crazy act and those who oppose the packing of the Court would not do such a stupid thing. It is an absurdity and ought to be looked into. The letters we are receiving are not the kind of propaganda that was inspired during the pendency of the public-utilities bill. My letters are from well-known people in my district, Republicans and Democrats alike, and obviously by men and women who are shocked at the President's plan and seek to protest turning over the control of the Court to the Chief Executive.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. I have received numerous letters from individuals in every section of my district, many of them from Democrats, who said they voted for President Roosevelt. I had my secretary sum up the total of the letters from my district alone: Opposed to the President's plan, 401; approving the President's plan, 3. This is exclusive of petitions, to the number of 135, which I did not include. Outside of the district: Opposed to the President's plan, 557; approving the President's plan, 21.

In conclusion, I have tried to lean over backward as far as I can in order to be fair. I did not impugn the President's motives or his intentions because I did not want to raise a partisan issue in this speech. I do not say that he is not trying to accomplish something which he believes is in the interest of the people. I just think he is wrong and that he is going about it in the wrong way. I do not believe that the Democrats in this House, who I submit are just as good and loyal citizens as the Republicans, will commit political suicide at the dictation of the President nor impair and destroy the independence of the Supreme Court. There is one way out of the difficulty—submit constitutional amendments to the people back home, the way we have done before, the way prescribed by the fundamental law of our land. Give the people a chance to pass judgment on all important changes in our form of government and in the Constitution. I propose that all Members cast aside their partisanship about the President's Court program and submit the issues to the people directly by way of constitutional amendments. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the Committee, and especially the gentlemen in charge of the bill, to a provision which occurs on page 27, under the heading of the Coast Guard. It is the proviso, commencing in line 10, page 27, reading as follows:

Provided further, That section 18 of the Treasury-Post Office Act, fiscal year 1934, is hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; and for the purpose of making such section applicable to such latter fiscal year, the figures 1934 shall be read as 1938.

This affects something I have very, very much at heart. It is the welfare of the enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. The provision referred to, section 18 of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act of 1934, was the provision which had the effect of reducing, in the interest of economy, so-called, the pay of soldiers in the Army and blue jackets in the Navy. I remind you that the pay of a private at that time was $21 a month. He was reduced to $17.80 a month in the interest of economy, with corresponding reductions in the Navy, the Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. Another reduction was the taking away of the so-called reenlistment allowance.

Under the law as it then stood, a soldier in the Army or a blue jacket in the Navy, upon completing his term of enlistment and expressing his willingness or intention to reenlist, received a small, additional allowance or bonus. The total amount appropriated by Congress before this suspension of the reenlistment allowance took place was comparatively small, but it is an extraordinarily important thing in the matter of the maintenance of a proper military policy.

What was the purpose of the Congress in establishing the payment of reenlistment allowances? It was to persuade the best enlisted men in the Army and in the Navy to stay in the service and rise to the grade of sergeant or chief petty officer, as the case might be.

Every man in this committee who has ever had anything to do with a military organization, in peace or in war, knows that in the last analysis the backbone of an army is the sergeant, and if we can keep the best men in the Army and allow them or encourage them to rise to the grade of sergeant or first sergeant and to relative grades in the Navy, like that of chief petty officer, we have done more to maintain the morale of the enlisted strength than anything else we may do.

We have taken this allowance away from them for 4 years. In the meantime economy has been utterly forgotten in all the other branches of the Government. The pay of practically all civil servants, all employees of the Government, which were reduced back in 1933 and 1934, has been restored. Only the soldiers of the Army and the blue jackets of the Navy have been neglected. This provision, if it stays in this bill, perpetuates this reduction, not only applicable to the Coast Guard but applicable to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps.

My plea is that when the time comes this particular provision be stricken out of this bill so that we may let the enlisted men of these faithful services go back to their original allowances. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. May I say to the gentleman from New York that it was testified before our subcommittee by Admiral Waesche, the commandant of the Coast Guard, that the reenlistment bonus would cost $412,896, and it was also testified that reenlistments at the present time run 50 percent, and it was not shown there was any administrative necessity whatever for reenlistments. I understand the gentleman based his argument on what he believed to be justice in the way of compensation. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Partly as a matter of justice in the way of compensation and partly, and I think more important, as a matter of proper military policy.

Mr. LUDLOW. It was not impressed upon us in our deliberations that there was any real emergency for restoration of this item and it was stated it would be a very expensive matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not so very expensive when we are counting the hundreds and hundreds of millions. It was not impressed upon the committee, probably, for the very simple reason that the Budget did not contain the item.

Mr. LUDLOW. It did not; no.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War cannot come before the committee and protest against the Budget. They have to swallow it and so do the enlisted men. There is no one to speak for them.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. In the past this has always been considered as a part of their pay and it was expected by them in that way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it has been considered as a part of their pay and it is a little thing at most, but when a man has done three hitches in the Navy or three hitches in the Marine Corps and he is making that his life profession and his officers want him to reenlist because he has become an exceedingly valuable noncommissioned officer, it is good military policy to keep that man in the service.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will yield a minute longer, I may never agree with the gentleman on agricultural policy, but I certainly agree with him on this.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You and I will hire a hall to argue on agricultural policies. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

I expect to spend a little time to discuss the bill in question, but before I get to that I desire to discuss the general budgetary system of the Government. According to the Budget which was sent up here, the estimated expenditures for this current fiscal year are $8,480,000,000. Since that time we have had a deficiency appropriation bill involving $1,000,000,000. We probably will have another. Without taking anything else into consideration, the present situation calls for estimated appropriations of $9,480,000,000. The estimated revenues, as near as I can figure them, will probably run $4,500,000,000, leaving a deficit for this current year on that basis of approximately $5,000,000,000 on the basis of expenditures.

With a national debt of $34,500,000,000 and Government guaranties of $5,000,000,000 and a little more, that makes practically $40,000,000,000 of debt. It means that we are running behind at a speed which is absolutely impossible to maintain. As indicative of the amount of expenditures that we are making, I call the attention of the House to the daily Treasury statement and to the fact that if we consider the actual expenditures for this fiscal year so far, without taking into consideration or crediting back any repayments on account of principal, they run to this minute approximately $5,080,000,000, as against approximately $4,700,000,000 a year ago. Our deficit on the basis of expenditures is approximately $40,000,000 more than a year ago. On top of that our tax revenues have been very largely raised. As indicative—and I think it is outstanding—of the way in which they have been raised, let me say to you that the estimates carried in this particular bill for the Treasury Department call for the printing of 138,061,159 sheets of postage stamps. They call for 142,004,047 sheets of internal-revenue stamps, and for the first time in the history of the United States the number of revenue stamps that are estimated to be required for the operations of the Government exceeds the number of postage stamps. That gives you an idea of the way we are progressing in increasing the tax burdens the people are required to bear.

I want now to discuss another subject that to my mind is of tremendous importance and that has a very considerable bearing on the budgetary situation that we are facing. The foreign debt to the United States has a face value of $12,097,000,000. It has an actual present value on a 3-percent basis of approximately $9,000,000,000.

The original foreign debt was $10,145,000,000. We have had payments of principal amounting to $757,000,000. Great Britain and France are large debtors to us. The World War lasted until every participant was financially and economically exhausted. The nations of the world are today in the process of starting a tremendous race in the building of armaments. Great Britain's program alone calls for $7,000,000,000. She is now asking for a loan of $2,000,000,000. Germany, France, and Italy are all engaged in that race, and are setting a pace at a rate that there is no question but that it will result in their complete bankruptcy if they go along a little further. These people seem to feel that they can go along and do this sort of thing and not pay us the debt which they owe us. I have it on the authority of one of the leading statesmen of another country that there is no prospect of an international disarmament treaty or a limitation until the financial resources of those countries are exhausted. Our present expenditures in this country are running at the rate of approximately $1,000,000,000 annually for military expenditures. Our naval expenditures have increased to the point where the Budget calls for approximately $600,000,000. They increased from $297,000,000 in 1933 to $570,000,000 in 1937; and I ask to put a table in the RECORD showing the appropriations and expenditures for this purpose over 11 years.

Year	Appropriation	Expenditures
1927	$322,061,975.00	$318,909,096.28
1928	318,131,957.00	331,335,491.98
1929	364,233,362.00	364,561,543.99
1930	384,900,000.00	374,165,638.55
1931	382,505,193.26	354,071,004.10
1932	363,227,785.22	357,820,860.41
1933	328,906,141.00	355,360,500.00
1934	310,169,558.93	297,029,290.96
1935	303,017,848.00	[1] 492,213,456.00
1936	483,062,929.14	529,031,665.94
1937	529,819,632.00	[1] 570,752,080.00

[1] Estimated.

I believe that we should have adequate national defense, but I hope that this Congress will not appropriate money for anything that is not necessary for national defense and that is not effective. I hope that we will not join that race for bankruptcy that seems to be in progress in the world. I hope that we will not violate the spirit in any way of the Johnson amendment, which prohibits on the part of this country loans to foreign countries in any way of our funds. Only in that way, and only by watching our own expenditures in cutting them down to the point that this country can balance her own Budget are we going to work out of the situation we are now in.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the gentleman think it is good policy for this Government to build battleships at a price of $51,000,000 each?

Mr. TABER. I think there is considerable question as to whether or not they provide as much effective defense for $51,000,000 as we could get in some other way. I do not think we should go too far with that situation. I think we ought to be careful and not get into those terribly expensive things that there is so much question about in respect to their utility at the present time.

Mr. BIERMANN. Admiral Sims, I believe, stated that if we got into another war the thing to do with battleships was to run them up the Mississippi River as far as possible and try to keep them out of harm's way.

Mr. TABER. None of us, of course, can tell anything about what would happen in another war, and we hope we will not experience one. Frankly, however, I have doubts about the effectiveness of the battleships as a unit in modern warfare.

Mr. BIERMANN. And is it not pretty generally conceded that the battleship is not a weapon of defense but a weapon of offense?

Mr. TABER. I would not say that absolutely, because if other countries were able to get near our coasts with airplane carriers and our air fleet should happen to be defeated, it might be that we would need battleships. I am not enough of an expert so that I would want to say it absolutely, but I do not think battleships have the relative value that we should get for the amount of money involved.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am glad to hear the gentleman talk about economy in military and naval expenditures. At the present time I think we have 120 Army posts in the United States. So far as I know, not an Army man has ever advocated eliminating any of them.

Mr. TABER. Whether they are occupied or not.

Mr. BIERMANN. And the Army divided amongst 120 posts is calculated to produce inefficiency, because of the fact that this makes it impossible to get together units of any size in one Army post. We cannot have brigades or divisions at Army posts. There are too many posts.

Mr. TABER. I think that is correct.

Mr. BIERMANN. Could we not save a lot of money by cutting the 120 Army posts down to 20, for example?

Mr. TABER. Perhaps not as low as 20, but we could cut them to a very considerable number below 120.

Mr. BIERMANN. We have one in our State that I suggest eliminating.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Does not the gentleman think that the battleship is the basis, the foundation stone, of our naval defense; in other words, that the battleship is the unit around which is built up the auxiliary forces, so many airplanes, so many submarines, and so many vessels of different categories and classifications?

Mr. TABER. That is coming to be very much doubted by very competent naval authorities. I served for 10 years on the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee, and I frankly doubt the necessity of going as far as some people would go in building battleships. I think perhaps we must have some battleships; I agree with that, but I do not believe we need go as far in that direction as some people say.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. It seems to me it is the fundamental, the integral part, around which the auxiliary forces are built.

Mr. TABER. We would have to have some battleships; there is no question about that.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. As I understand it, the philosophy of our Military and Naval Establishments is that we are preparing for defense.

Mr. TABER. I should hope it was.

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes; and it ought to be. My reading of history leads me to the observation that there has not been a time in at least 100 years, and probably a much longer time than that, when any defended shore line has been successfully invaded from the water.

Mr. TABER. That would depend on just what kind of a shore line it was and whose shore line it was.

Mr. BIERMANN. But the historical fact does not depend on that; that either is a fact or is not a fact. In the World War the big navies were all on the side of the Allies, but never a battleship got close enough to Germany to fire a shot into German territory.

Mr. TABER. There is no question of that.

Mr. BIERMANN. And the only time an attempt was made to attack a shore from the water was at Gallipoli, and that failed after just a few days. To say that any foreign country or combination of foreign countries could come across 3,000 miles of water and invade this country is, to my mind, utterly ridiculous.

Mr. TABER. I would not want to leave our coast entirely defenseless.

Mr. BIERMANN. No; nor would I, but we have guns down here at Fort Story that shoot 30,000 yards, I believe. That ought to keep them some distance offshore.

Mr. TABER. It is a good idea, however, not to have them within range of shore batteries, for that would bring a battleship within range of our cities, and if a battleship could occupy that position so could an airplane carrier. We have got to keep them farther away than 30,000 yards. I do not, however, think I shall go into this feature any further at present.

For just a few moments I shall talk about certain features of the bill regarding which questions have been asked, and one or two other features that occur to me.

Speaking first with reference to the appropriation for rural routes, frankly, I believe that there are sufficient funds carried in this item to take care of all reasonable extensions and increases in these routes that should be made next year.

All the information that we have as to current rate of expenditure, the estimated increase in number of routes, and all that sort of thing indicates that is true. I am in favor of providing reasonable increases and extensions of that Service.

With reference to the Railway Mail Service, as the chairman of the committee said, we have in preparation some additional data that has been suggested to us as a result of some questions which have been asked, and we hope to be able to answer any question with reference to that situation satisfactorily.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at the time we had our hearings the rate of expenditure was running at something more than $600,000 less than the amount of the current year's appropriation and something more than $350,000 below the rate of appropriation that we are carrying here. I believe there are funds enough there to permit of reasonable expansion of the Service.

I want to call attention to the amount of money that has been expended by this Government in carrying mail for various agencies of the Government and the way it has increased. There has been a lot of talk about the franking privilege. The amount spent by the Government to take care of congressional franking is not very heavy. It runs on an average over the last 4 or 5 years somewhere around $750,000. But the expenditure under the franking privilege has been by the departments. The W. P. A., for instance, have about 5,500 working on publicity. Every department of the Government has paid publicity agents who are covered up somehow or other.

The expenditures for governmental departments using the frank have increased from an average of about $9,000,000 a year over a period of 4 or 5 years ending with the fiscal year 1932, or an average of about $9,000,000 to $14,000,000 in 1933, to $23,000,000 in 1934, to $31,000,000 in 1935, to $32,236,000 in 1936, and if we spend at the same rate for the rest of this fiscal year that we did down to the 1st of January it will be $34,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

In addition to that figure the expenses of the Government Printing Office for printing the propaganda and all sorts of things of that kind have increased from approximately $10,000,000 a year to approximately $20,000,000 a year. That is the situation at this time. Every organization in the Government is sending out all sorts of propaganda—propaganda in fancy colors, pamphlets with pictures of reclamation projects, pictures of resettlement operations, pictures of W. P. A. propositions, and all that sort of thing. Perhaps the most insidious use of the franking privilege is that of the so-called emergency agencies. You know, this is an emergency administration. That is its chief characteristic and chief feature.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I am receiving mail under frank from these people where they have been out in the territory and collected signatures on petitions, sending them in to me, asking that their own activities be continued.

That kind of stuff is running the Government department mail up to the point where we have an actual postal deficit of very considerable proportions.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. Can the gentleman give us figures as to how much of a loss has been sustained by the post office for carrying second-class matter? That is, newspaper and magazine matter?

Mr. TABER. I do not know.

Mr. BIERMANN. I think it is about $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. TABER. What is it?

Mr. BIERMANN. About $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. TABER. Somebody told me it was $90,000,000, but I have not the figures.

Mr. BIERMANN. It used to be $90,000,000, but business has increased, and I presume newspaper and magazine mailings have increased.

Mr. TABER. The only thing carried in the statement of the Post Office Department as a subsidy is the county newspapers, and they are supposed to cost, according to figures that were given us on page 6 of the hearings, $615,645 for 1936.

Mr. BIERMANN. But the daily papers get a very much bigger dole.

Mr. TABER. I suspect it costs very much more to transport them than they pay.

Mr. BIERMANN. Ninety or a hundred million dollars more.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the figures the gentleman gave with reference to the cost of the franking privilege, only about 5 percent of the total amount is due to the franking privilege of Members of Congress? The rest is from the bureaus?

Mr. TABER. What is the gentleman's figure?

Mr. SNELL. Five percent.

Mr. TABER. Five percent is right.

Mr. SNELL. Five percent of it is due to Members of Congress?

Mr. TABER. Yes. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars as against approximately $34,000,000 for the current year if they go on at the same rate for the next 6 months.

Mr. SNELL. Every little while a Member on the floor of the House says that the Post Office Department for the first time is running at a profit. That was used as an argument during the campaign. May I ask the gentleman, how much extra money has been appropriated for the Post Office over receipts for the next fiscal year?

Mr. TABER. The expenses of the Department are estimated at $795,000,000 for this fiscal year, with a deficit of $80,000,000. This is without considering a very large item of cost that is borne by everybody else who does any business, in the nature of use of public buildings and in the nature of upkeep and maintenance.

Mr. SNELL. Even taking all of that out, it is running behind $80,000,000?

Mr. TABER. Eighty million dollars.

Mr. SNELL. How can anyone get up on this floor and continually tell us that the Post Office Department is running at a profit?

Mr. TABER. One has to have colored glasses to figure a profit.

Mr. SNELL. Does he also have to fake a little bit besides?

Mr. TABER. I would not be surprised.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is it not a fact the last Republican Congress in 1930 authorized the Post Office Department to take credit for some of these extraordinary outlays in figuring its balance, and that under that way of figuring the Republican Department had a loss of about $48,000,000 during the last year of Mr. Hoover, but the very next year, under Jim Farley and with the same kind of figuring, there was a surplus?

Mr. TABER. No; that is not the situation. That change was on account of the extra cent postage which Congress charged for first-class mail. That made up the $100,000,000.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman will admit that this surplus to which the minority leader alludes was calculated under a rule passed by a Republican Congress?

Mr. TABER. But it does not show a surplus under that rule—a deficit is shown.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman will then say definitely that under the rule passed by a Republican Congress Mr. Farley did not show a surplus?

Mr. TABER. It shows here a deficit of $19,000,000 in his own statement which was furnished us.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am not referring to this year. I am referring to a couple of years back.

Mr. TABER. I am referring to last year—1936.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. BEITER. The gentleman has been talking about the franking privilege. Does the gentleman know that the gentleman in the minority party circulated throughout my entire district a franked letter in opposition to the administration during the last campaign?

Mr. TABER. I know that the gentleman's party sent a great lot of stuff throughout my district under a frank, and there was not a single bit of literature sent out in my behalf, because I always use my own country newspapers. They are a good deal more effective, and, maybe, it happens that the gentleman got by because the other fellow did not use the country papers enough.

Mr. BIERMANN. If the gentleman will yield once more, I will say I was glad to hear the gentleman say he used the country newspapers. I was a country newspaper editor, and I should like to ask him, if it would not embarrass the gentleman, to answer this question: Did the gentleman financially compensate these country newspapers for using them?

Mr. TABER. I did wherever I had in an advertisement, and I had in several.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am pleased to hear that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. O'NEAL].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us has been explained by the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Treasury and Post Office. The ranking member of the committee on the minority side has supplemented the chairman's statement. It is not my intention now to discuss the contents of the bill, but to pay a brief tribute, and an inadequate tribute, to our chairman, Mr. LUDLOW, and to the ranking minority member, Mr. TABER. Due to sickness and other reasons, the real burden as to the preparation of this bill has fallen to the lot of these two gentlemen, aided by Mr. Sheild, the efficient clerk of the committee. Those who have not sat with Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. TABER cannot fully comprehend the infinite labor and great ability brought to the task by them.

They met early in December and almost daily from that time through the first week of February they sat for hours each day, and every item of this bill was investigated by public hearings, independent study, and keen insight. They are deeply sympathetic as to the needs of the departments and the personnel covered by this bill, but they accept their responsibilities to protect the interests of the taxpayers of this country. No doubt it would be very agreeable to them to be lavish in the distribution of Government funds and receive the pleasing plaudits of those benefited. But they choose rather to do their job, though it may have no such rewards.

This House may rest assured that these gentlemen, with the assistance of other members of the committee, have analyzed every proposed expenditure and made a sound contribution to the proper conduct of the business of these branches of the American Government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana yield 1 additional minute?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kentucky 1 additional minute.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have asked that this time be yielded because I am particularly interested in the tribute the gentleman from Kentucky has paid the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]. I may say to the membership of the House, as a great many of them know of his splendid talents as an author, his book which has just been published in the cause of peace, I believe should be read by all of us. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. I am pleased to have the gentleman's contribution, and I may add that my tribute was very inadequate as to both Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. TABER. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, the matter I want to talk about for a few minutes is the present and recent flood situation in the Ohio Valley, which has affected at least 9 States, if not 10, 11, or 12, and which has affected more than a million people—to be exact, 1,205,256—and 267,834 homes. If one could see the distress as we see it pictured and as we hear it from these flood-stricken areas—even the pictures we see in the newspapers could give but a faint idea of the distress as it exists in those sections. The Governor of our State, Governor Townsend, told me a few days ago that when he went through one of the cities—Jeffersonville, Ind.—after the water had gone down 5 feet, he went up the main streets in a motorboat, passing by windows on the second floor of the business rooms, and saw law offices with their books entirely destroyed, tables upside down, chairs tumbled hither and yon, with not a sign of life in that city, a city of some 15,000 people, with not a human being in it, and not even a sparrow to be seen or heard. Then, he said, as he went to other cities along the Ohio River in Indiana the same signs of desolation were to be found everywhere. I say to you that the agencies of government and the Red Cross have been and are doing a splendid job so far as their resources will permit, and as far as present legislation will permit. The Red Cross has had a response from all over the Nation in the sum of $21,000,000 plus, which will leave them $12,000,000 approximately after the first needs have been supplied, that is, getting the people out of the flooded districts, feeding them, and temporarily sheltering them until the worst is passed.

That $12,000,000 will be used, every dollar of it, in a splendid way, and with the least possible waste or loss. I doubt if any agency of the Government or any agency of any kind in the United States can equal or surpass the Red Cross, but this job is more than the Red Cross can do. The W. P. A. is coming in now, and they are doing a splendid job; but their work can only reach, under existing law, as I am told, going the furthest, giving it its broadest interpretation, to the inside of the house and cleaning up fallen plaster and wall paper, mud, debris, and so forth. They cannot repair the homes. They cannot go to a gully three blocks away and pull houses apart from other houses and drag them back to their own lots and foundations and reestablish them and make them livable. Something has to go beyond that. The Red Cross could and would do all that if sufficient cash were available, and they will do their utmost, but I insist this catastrophe is millions of dollars beyond their resources.

We have established the R. F. C. Disaster Loan Corporation for $20,000,000. That would amount to only $75 per home for each home wrecked in those flooded areas; and if people do not believe they are wrecked, I say to you that in the city of Lawrenceburg, Ind., a friend of mine who came through there on the train said he saw three blocks that had been solidly built that did not have a house on it, but down below in a lagoon were seven houses stacked up in mud and water among gasoline tanks, automobiles, telephone poles, cans, and rubbish, and what not. The Red Cross will go as far as they can go, but they cannot go far with $12,000,000. They can only have an average of $45 per home for the homes in these flooded areas. So with those two agencies but little can be done by comparison when we realize the loss will run into some $500,000,000. I am going to introduce in the very near future a bill to give money outright, grants to the people in these flooded areas and to people where catastrophes beyond their control have stricken them down. When I do that, it will not be without precedent in this House. In fact, ever since 1812 this Government has given outright, not only to people in the United States, not only to our own citizens, but it has given, time after time, to China, to Russia, to Belgium, and all over the world in time of need.

This Government has donated money outright to citizens all over the earth in stricken areas in time of cyclones, tornadoes, earthquakes, disease, floods, and what not. I consider, therefore, it will be appropriate, it will be fitting and right and humanitarian for the Government to help the people of this Nation in these stricken areas, and I believe the membership of this House will grant that it is right. I believe the people from every State of this Nation who have so generously contributed this magnificent sum of $21,000,000 to the Red Cross are heartily in accord with taking care of and helping the people in those stricken areas. Since the loss is so overwhelming and so stupendous, the people of this Nation will not only desire but expect our Federal Government to further lend direct financial aid. In addition to the money we have given to help people in distress in stricken areas, we have loaned enormous sums of money to nations in Europe, which money we will probably never get back. That is neither here nor there. That money is gone, but I say that when we can hand over our money lavishly to other nations of the earth we certainly can and will appropriate something besides loans to our own people in distress.

The H. O. L. C., as we have been told, will help people in these distressed areas, but only, as a matter of fact, to people who already have H. O. L. C. loans; but here is the situation in that respect: Just part of the people, of course, that are in distress have H. O. L. C. loans, and the people who have those loans were on their uppers when they got the loans. Many of them cannot pay their present loan dues. Many of them are losing their homes. How can they be expected to add to these loans and take on additional burdens and increase the loan they already have? How can they be expected to increase the loan when they can hardly pay what they already owe? The same thing is true with the farmers. They are in the same position; and as the Federal land banks were willing to loan them when they were already in distress, and did loan them as much as the already burdened farmer could meet in interest and loan retirement, how can they take on an additional burden?

It cannot be done except in rare instances. Many home owners, many farmers, and many small merchants must have direct out-and-out grants to put them on their feet so they can start again.

As I stated before, I am preparing now and will introduce in the near future a bill which I hope this House will kindly support, a bill that will help provide funds for those who suffered in this terrible catastrophe. It is no fault of any one of this one and a quarter million people that their homes and property have been destroyed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK].

THE MAN ON THE STREET

Mr. STACK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, my colleagues of the House, at this time I want to thank my colleague, Mr. LUDLOW, for granting me this time; and, Mr. Chairman, since time is valuable and I think I have something to say of interest to my people back home, I do not care to be interrupted. I am sorry that I will not be able to yield to any of my colleagues.

There has been much discussion during the past several days, in and out of Congress, respecting the proposal of the President to increase the membership of the Supreme Court. None of these discussions has intimated that the proposal was unconstitutional. The only argument advanced against it so far is that it is the intention of the powers that be to pack the Court and overthrow our system of government.

Nearly all the discussions here in the House have been from a legal standpoint, and, since the vast majority of our people are not lawyers, it must be reasonably supposed that they, too, have some interest in the matter.

I want to submit for your consideration another aspect of the question, one which I deem quite as important as the legal aspect, and that is the layman's view—the man on the street.

The great majority of the people in my district, in my State, and, in fact, the United States, are not lawyers and they have some trouble in comprehending just what is meant by constitutional government. They cannot reconcile constitutional government with the rule of the corporate power. They think, and rightly so, that constitutional government and its advantages were intended for all. That it should operate for all and not in the interest of the privileged few. When the man on the street realizes that constitutional government is government by judicial decree and discriminates against him, he wants something done about it. He wants those to whom he has entrusted the affairs of government to eliminate the conditions which operate to his disadvantage. He wants to know why there is so much hue and cry about packing the Court, when he knows that it has been packed before. If packing the Court is elevating to the bench lawyers who belong to the same political party as the appointing power, then the Court has been packed since the inception of our Government, and packed for a specific purpose. He also knows that to accomplish this it was necessary to openly violate the Constitution, which was done, and done by the political ancestors of those who now hold up their hands in pretended horror at such a thing.

In 1862, when the Civil War was raging, the chances for profits were good, but money was scarce. Gold was leaving the country, the banks were running short of specie, and governmental credit was somewhat restricted. These difficulties cramped the style of big business and endangered its profits. It lacked the volume of currency to swing its deals. So it brought pressure to bear on Congress—a Republican Congress—who did the bidding of big business by passing an act whereby the Government could issue Treasury notes and make them a legal tender.

This was clearly against the Constitution, because power to issue paper money was denied the National Government by the Constitutional Convention, by the men who wrote the Constitution. When this law reached the Supreme Court it was declared invalid by a vote of 5 to 3, one Judge not voting because of illness. No other decision was legally possible, but it did not suit the purposes of either big business or the Republican Party and it was denounced as illegal, unjust, and unpatriotic.

Think of such appellations being applied by the forces of reaction to the decision of a tribunal which they now want us to believe is sacrosanct. But luck smiled upon the reactionaries and they took full advantage of it. Shortly after the decision was reached, one of the Judges died, and another, who had voted with the majority, resigned. President Grant immediately appointed two outstanding party men, Joseph P. Bradley and William Strong, both of whom were known to hold views hostile to the decision rendered by the Supreme Court. The country rang with the charge that the Court was packed for the express purpose of overthrowing the Legal Tender decision, and so events proved.

At that time there were two cases on the Supreme Court docket in which the same question was involved, and the judges ordered them up for immediate argument. The former decision was reversed and an opinion handed down by Justice Strong, in which Justice Bradley concurred, the act was held to be constitutional. The reason advanced in justification of the reversal was that the act was passed when the country was endangered by civil war and it was necessary to the preservation of the Nation. But it was a clear amending of the Constitution by judicial decree and by a Court packed for that very purpose. There is, therefore, no excuse for our Republican friends becoming excited about packing the Court. They and their reactionary friends have set the precedent, if a precedent be needed. Their leaders not only packed the Court but violated the Constitution. This, however, did not destroy the Nation nor ruin our constitutional form of government. It merely gave the powers of corporate wealth what they wanted, and that ruins nobody—nobody but the common people.

If we Democrats were to commit a sin of the same political nature, it would cause no more wreckage than did that one, but the proposal of the President contemplates no such thing. It contemplates no constitutional violation whatever, since it is the constitutional right of Congress to increase the number of judges of any national court when it may see fit to do so. No one will deny that, not even our reactionary friends. But suppose we admit, for the sake of argument, that the intention is to pack the Court. What of it? The Court is packed now. It has been packed for generations—not by Presidential appointment, perhaps, but by the influence exerted over it by corporate power.

This control of government by the forces of reaction has been exercised almost continuously from the day the Government was erected, and it was never more pronounced than it is today. The President's idea seems to be not so much to pack the Court as to unpack it. He apparently wants what the man in the street wants, what we all want—to get rid of the corporate influence that is secretly ruining the Nation and get something like a square deal; a "new deal" for the American people.

The mere increase of Judges is not what is worrying the recipients of special privileges, but the knowledge of such an innovation at this time will diminish the influence which they possess over government through their control of the Court. From the same source comes the cry that the President's action is not honorable, but why it is not honorable is not stated. Is it honorable to make use of every means to prevent the adoption of the child-labor amendment? Is it honorable to move every force of government to deprive the laborer of his right to earn a decent wage? Is it honorable to work women long hours in unsanitary factories for a mere pittance or to force children into mills, that increased profits may be wrung from their little, stunted bodies?

The enemies of the present administration are indulging in a lot of blather about Congress having been forced to surrender to the President and his demand for a like surrender of the judiciary. When the friends of reaction were in control of the Government, and laws suggested by the Executive promptly passed and sanctioned by the Court, they extolled the statesmanship of a sagacious leader and the wisdom of a patriotic Congress. But when things changed, as they have changed, and they found their political philosophies in the discard, their views changed. Sagacious leadership of the Executive became an inordinate thirst for power. Congress was no longer patriotic—its action that of a rubber stamp—and effort to force the judiciary to a full sense of its responsibility is translated into a bid for dictatorship. No one knows better than those who make this ridiculous charge just how ridiculous it is. What they do not seem to realize is that what the President wants to do is to save our system of government—not to wreck it—to have it operate for the purposes for which it was intended by those who adopted the Constitution as their charter of government for the good of all and not the benefit of the few; to make democracy work so as to meet the demands of our swiftly advancing civilization.

In March of 1933 we were in the doldrums. Business was prostrated and our economic structure tottering. Mingled with the roar of exploding banks were the cries of a distracted people who could see little ahead save ruin. Every passing breeze swelled with the hideous music of despair. The Nation was verging on collapse. The agents of reaction—those eminent gentlemen who are now telling us what we should and should not do—were at the Nation's Capital crying for help; calling upon him, whom they now call "dictator", for protection; demanding that they be saved from the results of their ruthlessness and greed; pleading that they be not compelled to drain the bitter chalice of their own folly. It was a period of our history to try the soul of the bravest men. Under such circumstances President Roosevelt took over, and in taking over he had to find a way out. There was little time for calm reflection; little time to think of all the niceties that might have to be observed in order to keep proposed legislation within constitutional bounds. What was required was action, and action was had that steadied the Nation, dissipated the fear that was clutching at the hearts of the people, and brought about a semblance of order.

One of the important pieces of legislation then passed was the National Industrial Recovery Act. Those who might have doubted the constitutionality of the act yielded their doubt to the hope that it would succeed in staying what then appeared to be impending business disaster, and in this way they were not disappointed. It struck at the causes that were paralyzing business. That it went a bit askew constitutionally is not a matter of wonder when we consider that it was erected under the driving force of pressing necessity. It was held to be contrary to the Constitution because of the wide delegation of power to the President. But that was not a reason for some of the Supreme Court Judges assuming that all subsequent legislation of the same general nature would be similarly defective, or that the philosophy of the New Deal was basically unsound. This, however, seems to be the attitude they have taken, since it appears impossible to get their approval of legislation designed for the purpose of solving our present economic difficulties. The intent of the New Deal is to get our people on their economic feet; obtain for them an equality of justice; restore their confidence and bring them happiness. Every New Deal measure was framed with these objectives in view, but most of them, unfortunately, were thrown on the scrap heap by the judges.

A packed Court upheld the Legal Tender Act on the theory that its enactment was necessary to save the Nation, then threatened by the forces of insurrection. If it was justifiable for Congress to pass an act in direct violation of the Constitution and have the President pack the Court so that his illegal action might be given sanction of law on the theory that the country had to be saved from insurrection, why cannot we pass a law that is clearly constitutional and let the President pack the Court so that New Deal laws may be given legal effect on the theory that the Nation must be saved from economic collapse?

I have no particular objection to what Congress did in 1862. Had I been here I probably would have voted for the Legal Tender Act. My thought would have been to save the Nation—to save it at any cost. But when we saved it from one danger by unconstitutional means, why should there be so much complaint about saving it again from just as great a danger by means which in no way offend against the terms of the Constitution?

The man on the street cannot understand why the Guffey Coal Act, which tried to stabilize miners' wages in the bituminous-coal fields, was declared unconstitutional on the grounds that the National Government had no power to regulate wages of State industries, because to do so would be a violation of State rights.

The man on the street cannot understand why 1 week later the same Court overthrew the New York minimum-wage law which was passed by the New York State Legislature. In the Guffey Coal Act case the man on the street cannot understand why it was a violation of State rights, while in the New York Minimum Wage case he cannot understand why it is a violation of the due-process clause. In one of these cases the Court said the National Government cannot regulate wages in an industry under State control, since that was the right of the State where the industry was located. When the State of New York attempted to regulate wages in an industry under its control, it was declared void for a different reason. To the man in the street these decisions do not make sense. It is a case of "you be damned if you do and you be damned if you don't." Not only do they fail to make sense but they create a zone where the law of neither the State nor Nation can function. They lay out a nice big playground, right in the heart of the Government, where the special-privilege boys may play football with the people's rights without fear of being disturbed by any law. The man in the street wants this condition remedied. He wants human rights protected as well as property rights. He wants the rights of the masses to be taken care of just the same as he wants the rights of collective wealth taken care of. If it is necessary to pack the Court to get our people back to work; to take them off the relief rolls and to give the farmer a chance to realize something from his labor; to save our children from the devastating influences of mills and factories; to remove the obstacles which the forces of reaction are throwing in the pathway of human progress, then in the name of the Constitution, then in the name of justice and in the name of humanity let us pack the Court, and let us pack it well. [Applause.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] made several remarks during the course of the debate this afternoon with reference to his attitude on the President's proposal. I wonder if he had in mind his own adherence to the proposal of the leader of the Republican Party in 1912, the new prophet who appeared on the political horizon at that time, Theodore Roosevelt, Roosevelt the first, who promulgated the platform of the Progressive Party in 1912, which carried a plank infinitely more radical than that to which he takes exception this afternoon.

That platform contained a plank favoring the recall of judicial decisions. Surely the gentleman today would not reenunciate his allegiance to the recall of judicial decisions, but the gentleman at that time was not loath or hesitant in alining himself with the forces represented by Theodore Roosevelt, the elder, Roosevelt the first.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I must decline to yield because my time is limited.

Mr. FOCHT. Will not the gentleman go further in his remarks and tell us what became of that proposal of Theodore Roosevelt?

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I have such limited time that I cannot yield, although I do not want to appear discourteous.

Theodore Roosevelt at that time used these words:

> I do speak. Let the people recall the decision. The highest right of a free people is the right to make their own laws; and this right does not exist if under the pretense of interpretations an outside body can nullify the laws. I hold that the people should say finally whether these decisions are or are not to stand as the laws of the land.

That was Theodore Roosevelt, the head of the Republican Party and its President for two terms. It is pretty good philosophy today among certain liberal groups.

I recall, in particular, that a senior Senator representing a great State in another body in this Capitol said at the time when the nine old gentlemen who constitute the Supreme Court handed down their decision nullifying the A. A. A.—a 6-to-3 decision against the President's agricultural program—Senator NORRIS, said:

> Mr. President, if that decision shall stand, a large portion of the laws which Congress has enacted during the past hundred years are absolutely unconstitutional. The law giving relief from the effects of the boll weevil, the law providing relief for grasshopper sufferers, the law providing relief for those injured by earthquake, by wind, by storm, by hurricane, by drought, by dust storm, are likewise, every one of them, unconstitutional. Every provision in the laws creating and providing for the Bureau of Reclamation, upon which a large part of the West depends for its prosperity, is unconstitutional. In fact, there is not anything left of the Agricultural Department. It is all gone, all unconstitutional; and by fair implication, a great many of the other activities of the Government, almost too numerous to mention, outside of the Agricultural Department, will have to fall.

Mr. President, I say that decision cannot stand if our country is to live and prosper. * * *

The agitation for a change in the judiciary at this time springs from a universal demand on the part of the American people for some relief from judicial oligarchy. James M. Beck, in his monumental work on the Constitution, states that our Supreme Court is a "continuing constitutional convention." Beginning with Thomas Jefferson and going through Jackson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and down to Franklin D. Roosevelt, we have had Presidents who have found that the Supreme Court stood in the way of advancement and progressive legislation. The Japanese have a proverb to the effect that there are many roads that lead to the summit of Fujiyama, but they all converge at the crest. Many plans are being proposed in this Congress, Mr. Chairman, as a solution for the judicial problem. I, for one, do not adhere to any one particular plan. I believe there is good in many of the plans, but certainly the proposal offered by the President does not afford any substantial basis for such virulent opposition as it has encountered. Certainly the proposal that elderly Justices on the Supreme Court who have attained the age of 70 years should be retired does not go a bit further than legislation which was passed by the House in 1869 but which failed in the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSALS ARE NOT REVOLUTIONARY

Suggestions similar to that of the President were proposed again by an Attorney General of the United States, Mr. McReynolds, now a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1913. The same plan was proposed by Attorney General Gregory in 1914, 1915, and 1916. William Howard Taft proposed it in his annual report, and John W. Davis, as Solicitor General, proposed it and drew up the very bill incorporating it, and that bill is almost an exact copy of one presented to this body.

The statement is made that if the President appoints these Justices, he will appoint men who will be subservient to him. Did they say that when George Washington appointed 12 men to the Supreme Court? Did they say that when Andrew Jackson appointed five to the Supreme Court? Did they say that when Lincoln appointed five? Did they say that when Grant appointed four, or when Harrison appointed four, or Taft appointed five, besides a Chief Justice? Did they say that when Harding appointed four and Hoover appointed three? No. It was all right for these distinguished predecessors of our present President to appoint Justices of the Supreme Court. No one was then bold enough or had the temerity to suggest that our President first went to the gentlemen and inquired of each of them, "Will you carry out my orders?" No. It was assumed a President of the United States would appoint men who were in sympathy with the general program of the party with which he was connected. The people of the United States are demanding a liberalization of our judiciary.

They have voted on this question in last fall's campaign. I differ with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who has frequently said on this floor that the issue was not presented in the last campaign, and that therefore the people had no opportunity to vote on it.

SHALL WE BE HIDE-BOUND BY PRECEDENT?

The Republican opposition presented it in every way in newspapers and newspaper editorials. Every day Democratic nominees for Congress and the Senate were aspersed with the charge we were attempting to wreck the judiciary. We were charged with an attempt to destroy the Constitution when, as a matter of fact, all we were attempting to do was to make that immortal document a living, breathing, vibrant instrument that will respond to changing things, changing trends of the hour, in order to make America go forward with the New Deal, to a new day about which our President has preached, and not make it ruled by the doctrine of "mortmain", the dead hand, such as the one that almost destroyed the English judiciary, until 200 years ago they divorced themselves from the doctrine that their appellate courts had the right of judicial review of acts of Parliament. For 200 years no high court in Great Britain has attempted to nullify the acts of its Parliament. The people of this country are asking that those who were elected under the program of the New Deal as Members of this Congress put through the liberal program.

How are we going to put it through? Are we going to say to the people, as was said to Shylock in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, "You may have your pound of flesh, but you may shed not one drop of blood to obtain it." Shall we tell them, "You may have the New Deal, but you will have to go over the hurdle of the Supreme Court and we intend to stand supine and effortless while permitting that tribunal to nullify our liberal statutes."

Of what avail is it to attempt to enact legislation if five out of the nine are so contumacious as to refuse to interpret the Constitution in line with the progressive tendencies of our judiciary?

Something was said about the age of Congressmen as being pertinent to the discussion with reference to the age of members of the judiciary. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] said, "Why, when Mr. Roosevelt insists when a man is 70 he is superannuated, he is at the same time aspersing Members of Congress and Members of the Senate, because they might be 70 years of age." But the gentleman neglected to suggest that the Members of Congress go back to the people every 2 years, and if the people, after having surveyed their legislative record, are satisfied with their record they may have the opportunity to reelect them, or displace them. The same is true with the Senate every 6 years. But the judiciary remains there until upon the age-enfeebled ears of the members thereof there falls the beckoning music of eternity.

For too long American citizens have been erroneously led to reverence rules, traditions, and institutions solely because they were hoary with age or seemingly sanctified by customs. This has tinctured the viewpoint of many worthy citizens relative to the Federal judiciary. I, for one, want to be divorced from those in that category. I decry all tendencies of Americans to assume a Confucianistic attitude toward jurisprudence. Simply because a viewpoint has been repeated belligerently and adhered to obstinately through the years does not, ipso facto, make it worthy of continuation.

In the Middle Ages when the erudite teachers and theologians of the day were confronted with something new their reply was substantially to the effect that if the new thought or invention were not mentioned in the works of Aristotle or in the Bible it could not be considered. Are we to be afflicted with the same mental astigmatism?

Lawyers and judges have for too long genuflected at the altar of the hallowed doctrine of stare decisis. Let the decision stand and guide future generations. Our conservative judges have a pronounced penchant for adhering, in many cases unconscionably, to legal interpretations of the Constitution handed down by predecessors generations before. Let the past teach us lessons; let it offer us a way; but do not let it arbitrarily control our destiny as a nation. Some people are dismayed by words. They are word worshipers. They are overawed by phrases. To them the word "socialism" is a source of fear, and words of similar character send a chilling feeling through their veins. This is a dynamic universe, and static concepts have no place in it. The courts must be brought up to date in their interpretations, just as philosophy, economics, mechanics, medicine, science have been brought up to date.

In the Bible will be found these words: "Thy works shall be changed."

Madison did not regard the Constitution as a rigid boundary. He held it to be an instrument which should serve as a framework for governmental guidance. It was anticipated that it would always be interpreted broadly, consistent with the altering conditions which might prevail.

WHY PLACE JUDGES ON A PEDESTAL?

Many worthy citizens of our country mistakenly revere the courts as being occupied by judges above and beyond human ken. They deify the judiciary. I can see no reason for so exalting a man as virtually to canonize him the moment he puts on the black robe of his office. Twenty-five years ago this country was agitated by belligerent demands from liberals for the incorporation into law of the principle of recall of judges. Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, in a speech in favor of the recall of judges, eloquently argued that judges, as such, were as human as are you and I. They breathe the same air, think the same thoughts, eat the same food, respond to the same stimuli. Let us view this whole problem with a sense of humor. Let us employ common sense.

The reactionaries have been chanting jeremiads against those of us who are bold enough to advocate publicly the passage of legislation designed to liberalize the courts. Javelins of ridicule have been hurled at the head of our great President for carrying out the people's mandate—that the reform measures which comprise the New Deal shall become effective valid instruments for ameliorating agriculture, diminishing poverty, providing substantial aid for flood- and drought-stricken citizens. The New Deal was given a mandate last fall to carry on, and the plain people of America will resent whomever and whatever stands in the way of that objective. The people have demonstrated that they believe in Roosevelt. They have shown, at least by every sign and portent, that they wish his program effectuated. For that reason, Roosevelt has offered his plan for retirement of judges at 70.

I commend to the Congress the reading of Gilbert E. Roe's Our Judicial Oligarchy; J. Allen Smith's Spirit of the American Government; Allen Benson's Dishonest Constitution; Charles Beard's Economic Interpretation of the Constitution; Nine Old Men, by Allen and Pearson; The Ultimate Power, by Morris L. Ernst; and The Letters of Jefferson.

THOMAS JEFFERSON ANTICIPATED OUR PRESENT DIFFICULTY WITH THE COURTS

Jefferson is, in my opinion, the greatest philosopher of government America has yet produced. Certainly he was the greatest scholar of his time. Jefferson felt strongly about the abuse of judicial power. One hundred and twenty-five years ago our third President advocated a provision to be added to the Constitution as an amendment providing for the election of the Federal judiciary for a definite term of years. Resolutions have been introduced in many Congresses to the same effect. Thomas Jefferson wanted our judges to be responsive to the will of the people. He even went so far as to argue that Federal judges should be removed by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress, a system which now prevails in England. Said Jefferson:

> • • • But it is not from this branch of the Government (Congress) we have most to fear. Taxes and short elections will keep them right. The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric.

Again Jefferson said, in a letter dated October 31, 1823:

> At the establishment of our Constitution the judiciary bodies were supposed to be the most helpless and harmless members of the Government. Experience, however, soon showed in what way they were to become the most dangerous; that the insufficiency of the means provided for their removal gave them a freehold and irresponsibility in office; that their decisions, seeming to concern individual suitors only, passed silent and unheeded by the public at large; that these decisions, nevertheless, become law by precedent, sapping by little and little the foundations of the Constitution, and working its change by construction, before anyone has perceived that this invisible worm has been busily employed in consuming its substance. In truth, man is not made to be trusted for life if secured against all liability to account.

Chief Justice Clark, formerly of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, quoted Governor Baldwin, recently chief justice of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, as follows:

> The right of a court to set itself up against the legislature • • • is something which no other country in the world would tolerate.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, this subject is so vast and contains so many ramifications that one may only touch a few of the high spots in one address. It is my hope that on subsequent occasions I may expatiate further on the matter of the cogent necessity, as I conceive it, of a reform in the Federal judiciary. The war is on between the liberal and reactionary viewpoint. Let us lend our hearts and our talents freely to the solution of this national problem. [Applause.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM].

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, in view of the present consideration of the appropriation bill for the Post Office Department, I want to speak in commendation of the Post Office employees for undertaking and completing for the Social Security Board the registration of applicants for old-age pensions. Recent report shows that over 23,000,000 employees' applications for old-age pension benefits were gathered in by the post offices of the country. The work was done expeditiously and with an exhibition of intelligence that redounds to the great credit of the Department. While the letter carriers distributed the forms and necessary instruction sheets, the postmasters, clerks, and other inside employees supervised the typing of the applications and their dispatch to the Social Security Board. The work was done with the aid of typists called in for extra service.

The competency of the postal employees in this work has raised the question in my mind of why they are not enlisted to make a census of the unemployed in this country. With the knowledge of their routes and the people who live on them, they would start off highly informed as to the unemployed in their district. I would suggest a scheme of self-registration by which the letter carriers would leave at each home necessary information sheets to be filled out by the unemployed. These questions should be few in number and, of course, carefully framed to elicit enough information and not too much. After a lapse of time during which newspaper discussion of the objects of the census would be widely disseminated and the assistance of the people would be solicited in helping to make the census an accurate count, the registration sheets would then be gathered.

If at all possible, I should then like to see the local post offices compile the results—at least the general figures as to the number of unemployed in each community. This would make it possible to have an immediate picture of unemployment. If the records were sent to Washington for tabulation, the delay would be such as to cause the country to lose interest in the results. Incidentally the one purpose of the census would be to make the public realize what I fear would be found—that the problem is much more serious than we estimate.

One gets a glimpse of the seriousness of unemployment when he finds from the recent report of the W. P. A. more than one-third of the workers are over 45 years old. If factories are to continue the policy of not employing men over that age, it is easy to see that expanding business will not help in putting this class of men back into private employment—rather the employers will tend to work their men longer hours. This estimate of men on W. P. A. over 45 years is not high enough for my part of the country, for in one county of the W. P. A. district in which my home is located the number of W. P. A. men over 45 years of age is 60 percent of the total. In that locality the age limit is enforced universally by factories.

Now, reverting to the suggestion of the enumeration by the Post Office Department, I may say that I made the suggestion to one high Government official, and he has criticized it on the ground that it would not give universal coverage. However, I believe that such houses as are missed on the regular mail routes could be visited for the unemployment census without many omissions. On the other hand, Post Office Department officials tell me that they could do the job satisfactorily if the Government assigned it to them.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, these remarks closely approximate a broadcast which I gave last evening over the Columbia System.

Every American schoolboy is taught that his liberty depends upon a separation of governmental functions into legislative, executive, and judicial branches maintained by a constitutional system of checks and balances.

Consequently the opponents of President Roosevelt's judicial reorganization very wisely refrained from much argument concerning the need for the proposal. Instead they began to shout about "destroying checks and balances and packing the courts." A dramatic appeal to childhood prejudices and fears makes logical thinking difficult.

But to those of us who last November cast prayerful votes for our great New World leader, such emotional appeals are not convincing.

We want to know the facts about this judicial legislative check and whether there is a corresponding balance. We also want to know whether increasing Court membership is new and dangerous or old, harmless, and constitutional.

Let us examine these checks and balances. The power of the Federal court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional was never granted by the Constitution and is still ardently questioned by many students. Nevertheless, it has been exercised too long to be denied today. However, the courts themselves have unanimously and repeatedly laid down two basic controls on the exercise of this power.

First, before a law can be declared unconstitutional it must be so beyond a reasonable doubt. Second, in declaring an act unconstitutional a court must scrupulously adhere to interpretation and not embark upon lawmaking. These two controls operated so effectively that prior to the Civil War the number of laws declared unconstitutional was negligible. However, from 1885 the decisions declaring acts unconstitutional have fallen from the Federal courts as raindrops. With this deluge the requirement of unconstitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt and the restriction against judicial lawmaking have taken their place with the dodo bird among the things that were but are not.

Reasonable doubt is no unfamiliar term. In criminal cases if only 1 of the 12 jurors remain unconvinced to this high degree the defendant is never convicted. What shall we say of the verdict of five men, well learned in the law and true, who declare a legislative act unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt, while four colleagues equally learned, reading the same brief and hearing the same argument, are equally sure that the law is constitutional? The answer is too obvious for argument. The courts are not adhering to their own rules of the game. They are declaring acts unconstitutional because in the opinion of the majority of the Court some particular law is deemed unwise. For example, New York recently passed a law fixing a minimum milk price. The Supreme Court by a 5-to-4 decision declared that law constitutional. The same State passed a law fixing a minimum wage for women, and the same Court by a 5-to-4 decision declared that law unconstitutional. The obvious distinction being that price cutting on the property market is against the general welfare, while price cutting on the labor market advances the general welfare.

One Justice changed from one side to the other in these two different cases, and was certain in one case that the law was constitutional, and certain beyond a reasonable doubt in the other case that it was not constitutional. To say that such decisions have even a distant connection with any principle of reasonable doubt as recognized in the law is simply ludicrous.

The decisions are full of statements to this effect by eminent judges themselves. Justice Brandeis, dissenting from a decision declaring a State law regulating the weight of bread unconstitutional, declared that decision to be—

> An exercise of the powers of a superlegislature—not the performance of the constitutional function of judicial review.

Justice Harlan, in the Standard Oil case, declared—

> In short, the Court now by judicial legislation, in effect amends an act of Congress.

Justice Holmes, in the Child Labor case, declared that the Court had entered a field reserved for the consideration of Congress alone, and had repudiated its repeated declarations against lawmaking.

Justice Harlan again, in the Income Tax cases, declared that decision to be an effort of—

> The judiciary to supervise the actions of the legislative branch upon questions of public policy.

Justice Moody, in the Employer Liability cases, says:

> Legislators have their own economic theories, their views of justice and public policy, and their views when embodied in written law must prevail.

Justice Stone, in the recent A. A. A. decision, says:

> The suggestion that the power of Congress to levy taxes must now be curtailed because it may be abused by unwise use, hardly rises to the dignity of argument. Such suppositions are addressed to the mind accustomed to believe that it is the business of the courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action.

The number of such indictments against the Supreme Court by its own members could be multiplied, but they are well summarized in the remarks of Chief Justice Hughes when Governor of New York:

> The United States is governed by a Constitution. The Constitution is what the Judges say it is.

This judicial constitution making has produced rather startling results. In effect it has given us two constitutions—one applicable to the operation of property and another controlling the conduct of persons. Under the first, which we may call the property constitution, very generally whenever States have attempted to curb vested interests, the Supreme Court has nullified such laws as depriving individuals of property without due process of law. When the Federal Government has attempted similar legislation, it has been told that it was exceeding its powers over interstate commerce. In the meantime the Federal Government has no general police powers and the States have no control over interstate commerce. Down this avenue of anarchy, paved largely by judicial law making, vested interests have traveled rejoicing, protected by our laws, consuming the cream of our natural resources, many times heartlessly exploiting both labor and agriculture, but wholly free from either State or Federal control.

Now, let us look at our judicially created Constitution for personal behavior. Under this Constitution the States seldom hear of due process of law. They have been permitted to ignore these procedural steps in criminal cases referred to as due process of law by our constitutional fathers. The Federal courts have also decreed contrary to all Anglo-Saxon precedent that, when expedient, State criminal laws may be liberally construed. The powers of the Federal Government have also expanded under this personal constitution. Here it has almost unlimited power in its control over interstate commerce. It controls lotteries, frauds, employees' compensation, prison-made goods, intoxicating liquors, and stolen automobiles. In fact, whenever property interests have not objected, the Federal Government has been permitted to exclude from interstate commerce all commodities produced, transported, or sold contrary to public policy.

The present issue between our legislative and judicial branches which has caused all this commotion is simply whether our property or our personal constitution shall prevail.

Congress has chosen the personal constitution, under which every provision of New Deal legislation, excepting possibly delegated powers, was based on adequate authority. Prior to the final Supreme Court decision these New Deal laws were sustained by Federal, district, and circuit courts about as often as they were rejected. For example, the lower courts rendered 23 decisions for the N. R. A. and 25 against. In wrecking the congressional program our Supreme Court adhered to the property constitution, which it alone had created.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I would be glad to yield to my Buckeye colleague.

Mr. McSWEENEY. What does the gentleman think about the operation of a Supreme Court of 15 members?

Mr. HARLAN. I think that we will never have a Court of 15 members. When this Congress, as representing the will of the people of the United States, shows to the Supreme Court by the adoption of this reorganization bill that the services of men over 70 years of age on our Supreme Court is no more to be desired than is the services of men of similar age in industrial executive capacities, I believe that the members of that body will resign, and that there will be no substantial increase in the Court. If there is an increase, it will be the responsibility of the Supreme Court members and not of the Congress.

Every American has more than ample reason to be proud of our Supreme Court. Almost without exception it has been composed of the finest lawyers and the best citizens we can produce. Its interpretive decisions equal those of any tribunal in the world. However, when judges embark on lawmaking, no matter how profound their learning or how unselfish their motives, they become as other lawmakers, swayed by political prejudice and controlled by those basic emotions which arise out of heredity and environment.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Does my colleague from Ohio believe that the adoption of this bill will in any way tend toward making the Executive a dictator over all the governmental functions?

Mr. HARLAN. Most certainly not. The step which the President proposes is the least drastic of all measures that are available to him. We could pass a law fixing the number of judges necessary to declare an act unconstitutional at two-thirds. We could pass a law taking the question of constitutionality entirely away from the lower Federal courts. In fact, there are many other steps that might be taken, but the President has chosen to continue as nearly in our present line of procedure as possible. He will have no more control over the decisions of his appointees than has any other President in the past.

For a man to become a dictator he must exercise some power against the will of the people. The President has never taken a single step in this direction, nor has the proposed measure. Every President in our history that has attempted to curb those interests which have prospered under our court-made property constitution, has been the victim of howls when he has taken steps to protect the people from exploitation. They called Jackson a king; Lincoln a tyrant; Theodore Roosevelt was called Theodore the First; Wilson was a despot; and now Franklin Roosevelt is a dictator.

Those interests want men like Coolidge, Harding, and Hoover in the President's chair, and they want a Supreme Court that will let them go their way unmolested. When anyone suggests that they should come under the same law that controls the rest of our citizenship they begin to whimper and whine about class agitation. The same spirit that brought forth "Let them eat cake" is still abroad calling Roosevelt a dictator.

Now, what does the good old Constitution, the real one, provide for our present condition of governmental unbalance created by judicial lawmaking? It says that the executive and legislative branches together shall control the number of judges and, by selection, determine what kind of emotional and intellectual background these judges shall have. Under this authority plans containing almost all portions of the President's proposal have at different times been recommended by past Presidents, approved by Congress, and endorsed by men who later occupied the Supreme Bench.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. McSWEENEY. What does the gentleman think about the advisability of a constitutional amendment of some kind?

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would probably be harmless to let the people vote on an amendment, but during the intervening time I should say we could proceed under the Constitution as it exists, and then, if subsequently the people approve an amendment, the reorganization law would be unnecessary.

It took 4 years to get the income-tax amendment through. We never have gotten the child-labor amendment, and, in fact, the only amendments that we have ever gotten in a short time have been those amendments which property has not objected to. Thirteen States, containing an insignificant fraction of our people, can block an amendment; and with the opposition of all the organized selfishness in this country, we will be well into the next panic before any amendment can be adopted.

But to return to the judicial lawmaking, which is the crux of the present dilemma, whenever our judicial branch constitutes itself a third legislative chamber, chosen for life, and utterly contemptuous of the overwhelming desires of the elected lawmakers, the Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to appoint a majority, if necessary, in that third legislative chamber. Such procedure disturbs no checks or balances. It merely utilizes the ones which the original Constitution gave us. We neither desire nor need any amendments to our original Constitution to carry out a progressive program. What we need and will get by the court reorganization bill is the removal of these court-made constitutional amendments injected into our Constitution since 1885 by lawmaking judges. After all, this is a democracy, and just as the English Parliament had to curb its House of Lords, an occasional check upon our own "house of lords" might be salutary. [Applause.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP].

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Chairman, I realize that in a general debate such as we have before us today it is a very flexible mind that can immediately pass from one subject to another if, indeed, a speaker may be fortunate enough to carry his audience with him.

I have always been intensely influenced, naturally, by the environment of the people in my own district and by the main industry of my district, which is agriculture. I saw plainly some years ago how my country was being depleted of its farm owners and the land gradually going into the hands of speculators and large landowners. I became so alarmed over this that in 1930 I began to speak over the radio every Sunday morning in order to tell about this frightful thing that was confronting us. Although I live in one of the best counties of Nebraska, 60 percent of the farmers of that county have become renters and were plowing and cultivating land that did not belong to them.

So, urged on by a desire to do something for agriculture in general and to check the growing menace of farm tenancy, I introduced a bill a few days ago which I believe will go far in helping to solve this problem. I was greatly encouraged to find that when a report on the farm-tenancy question came from the President of the United States a few days ago to this body everything he suggests in it is practically covered in my bill, which was introduced before the receipt of his message. Based on years of farming and my association with the Federal land bank of the eighth district for the last 20 years, or since its inception, I agree thoroughly with him in everything he says on this subject.

My bill is H. R. 4723, providing for direct farm-home financing by the Federal Government, embodying the principles of the Farm Loan Commissioner Act that was passed in 1933. My bill was born of sheer necessity to counteract the loss of the 40,000 farm homes that is taking place yearly, and in answer to the pleadings of 3,000,000 farmers and renters, tillers of the soil, and 1,000,000 young men and women from the farm, schooled in agriculture, but denied the opportunity to acquire a farm home. Contrary to the policy of the Government in the past when we have said, "Only to those who have shall be given", this bill provides that to those who have not shall be given. In the past we have said, through the Federal land bank, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Housing Act, and the Commissioner's Second Mortgage Act, and any other Government loaning agency, "Unless you are financially able to ante up from 20 to 35 percent, you will not be considered." In my bill, if you have honor, ability, and integrity, you will be considered, even though you do not have money. In this bill the farmer says to Uncle Sam: "You were good to us in 1933, when you gave to some of us second mortgages on our farms, and we are sorry you are losing millions of dollars through your good efforts, and we all know the big insurance companies and the big loaning companies got this money, as we could not get a cent unless we owed it to them; yet, regardless, just load this burden on our backs collectively and we will see that you are paid back if you will just lend us a little of your unlimited credit."

Yes; this bill will give back to Uncle Sam millions of dollars he would otherwise lose in commissioner second mortgages. It will give back to the tiller of the soil a farm and home, and give to the Nation millions of homes that are the units in the foundation of our Government.

When I speak of the Commissioner Second Mortgage Act it is a matter with which I am very familiar through my close acquaintance with the activities of the eighth Federal land bank district. These Federal land banks and all the other large loan companies speak of Uncle Sam as a Santa Claus in connection with these commissioner second-mortgage loans. They think it is perfectly all right that he should lose these second mortgages, and Uncle Sam is losing on these mortgages where there is the best kind of equity, because no one is interested in taking care of Uncle Sam. Consequently they close out the second mortgage and Uncle Sam holds the sack. I know of individual cases where there was at least 50 percent above the first mortgage, and yet they have not taken care of Uncle Sam.

This bill protects the Federal Government against losses that have been sustained, or which may be sustained by reason of the Farm Loan Commissioner Act, in that it provides for the purchase by the Federal Government of lands on which the Government holds second mortgages, which lands are now under foreclosure, or which have been foreclosed, or which may hereafter be under foreclosure. In other words, it prevents the Federal land bank and other loaning agencies from using Uncle Sam as Santa Claus, a term, as I have said, now commonly used in referring to the Government's second-mortgage loans under the Farm Loan Commissioner Act.

It provides for the reselling of these lands and other lands to be purchased and provides the plan and terms of such sales. The cost of administration of this act by the Farm Loan Commissioner and the Farm Credit Administration should not exceed one-half percent.

The act provides that not more than $8,000 shall be invested by the Farm Loan Commissioner in any one farm home. The act provides for 4½-percent annual payments, 1½ percent of which is interest and 3 percent is for amortized payments on principal.

It provides that the title to all land sold under this act shall be vested in the Farm Loan Commissioner, for the United States, for 20 years, when one-half of the purchase price has been paid to the Land Bank Commissioner. Then a deed is given and a mortgage is taken back for the balance. It provides for payments on the amortization plan over a period of 40 years.

The vesting of the title in the Land Bank Commissioner, for the United States, has four important features:

The purchaser cannot sell or barter the land; in other words, it keeps the land out of speculators' hands. If you reduce the rate of interest and do not put a ceiling on it, you will increase the purchase price of the land, because of the cheaper rate of interest. So you have to have a roof on your house to make it satisfactory; so this holds down speculation by leaving the title in the name of Uncle Sam for the first 20 years. And after half has been paid down, my bill provides that we give a deed to the farmer, and we take a mortgage back.

The purchaser cannot lose the land by reason of a second mortgage. A great deal of criticism has been made of my bill because it eliminates taxes, but in this way it benefits the State and the county and the municipality, and they should at least cooperate with the National Government in order to bring about this home ownership; and the only thing that we ask of the States and the communities is merely this: "If you allow them to go for 20 years, without taxation, in order to give them a start, except for improvements, it will be of benefit to your State and your community."

It eliminates the danger of land inflation, which would cancel the advantages to be gained under this act. I noticed today in a circular that comes from Mr. Myers, of the Federal land bank, that he says there is a danger of land inflation. I know there is. I know one banker who now has 50 farms, and I know that the farm banks have to foreclose on thousands of them, and I know that the Land Bank Commissioner is foreclosing on hundreds of others. As the price of land advances—and it is advancing—these farms get into the hands of large landowners and speculators, and the individual type of farm home owner is being crowded out of ownership, as the records show.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not a fact that the Federal land banks, when they dispose of this land, withhold half the mineral rights?

Mr. BINDERUP. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman introduce a bill to prohibit the land banks from withholding those mineral rights?

Mr. BINDERUP. I think I shall stick on the surface of the land and let someone else introduce such a bill as the gentleman refers to, to protect the individual owner from anything of that kind. My bill applies only to the farm land.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman hold that is right?

Mr. BINDERUP. That is something that I would not argue about, and I think probably the gentleman is right about that; but my bill does not contemplate that. I am holding to the principles of my bill.

My bill exempts these farm homes from judgments and attachments for old debts contracted during the depression. It makes the Government safe by retaining title in the name of the Land Commissioner. The bill would waive amortized payments on principal for the first 5 years.

The contract of sale cannot be transferred, except from husband to wife or wife to husband by inheritance. In case of termination of contract before maturity for any reason, the Government shall retain all payments made under the contract and same shall be considered as a fair rental price for use of the land, except that the purchaser shall be paid for improvements made on the land at a fair appraised value.

The financing of purchasing of land by the Farm Loan Commissioner shall be made possible by the financing of contracts of sale of such land through the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve banks, in like manner as national banks are now financing farm mortgages.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

REMEMBER THE (LEGISLATURE OF) MAINE; THEY DENOUNCED THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, usually when I get on this floor I am all steamed up, but I feel rather relaxed today, and anyone who wishes to sleep or rest during my address may do so. But I shall appreciate it if gentlemen who are talking loudly will go outside, so that the rest can sleep if they wish. That is only parliamentary courtesy.

I am going into history a little bit today, and I shall read a resolution which was read in the Senate yesterday. It was passed by the Legislature of the State of Maine, because that legislature sometimes does things right—and every now and then Texas does things that are wrong.

OH, READ THE DENUNCIATION OF THE COURT

It is a very important thing, because history hinges on this resolution of the State of Maine. It concerns the Dred Scott decision, rendered in 1857, which led to the Civil War. It reads:

Whereas such extrajudicial opinion subordinates political power and the interests of the American people to the cupidity and ambition of a few thousand slaveholders—

You might substitute in contemporary history "a few hundred industrialists."

Then the legislature goes on:

Therefore:

Resolved, That the extrajudicial opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott is not binding in law or conscience upon the Government or the citizens of the United States, and that it is of an import so alarming and dangerous as to demand the instant and emphatic reprobation of the country.

COURT SHOULD BE RECONSTITUTED, SAYS MAINE

That was Maine talking, just before the Civil War. The resolution continues:

Resolved, That the Supreme Court of the United States should by peaceful and constitutional measures—

And that is what Mr. Roosevelt is recommending at this time in his judicial plan. I read again—be so reconstituted as to be relieved from the domination of a sectional faction.

That is the Maine Legislature, when it saw clearly the grave issues just previous to the Civil War.

ISSUE EXACTLY SAME TODAY—CHEAP OR SLAVE LABOR

What is the issue today? The issue today is exactly the same as it was in 1857 which lead to the Civil War, and that is cheap labor or slave labor, call it whatever you please.

When I went to law college I read the Dred Scott decision. I had to. I did not read it carefully, so for the last 3 months I have been reading it. I am a southerner. The men of my family were all Confederate soldiers. The reason that hundreds of thousands were killed and we had to go to war was through the Supreme Court decision of an illiterate colored man by the name of Dred Scott. Poor Dred! He did not know what it was all about. Except for that case and the Court going out of its way to declare the Missouri Compromise unconstitutional, the Negroes could have been freed and white men could have saved themselves from killing each other.

COURT COMPARES HORSES AND CATTLE TO NEGROES—NORTHERNERS ANGRY

Here is approximately the holding in the Dred Scott decision:

First, that the Government could no more prohibit a southerner taking his slaves west and northwest than the southerners could prohibit the northerners taking their horses and cattle south. Was not that a humane consideration?

The second was that colored persons, as they said, will carry the stigma and degradation forever and ever, and could never be citizens of the United States in any State in the Union. It held they could be citizens of the State of Maine and other free States, but could not enjoy the citizenship of American citizens, although they were already American citizens. The Court had, in other words, deprived them of American citizenship.

DRED SCOTT DECISION LEADS TO WAR

Those were the principal holdings of the Dred Scott decision. It led to war. Also, then, decisions which are being rendered by the Supreme Court today are based on looking backward instead of looking forward.

They look back to slave conditions in order to pass on social security. The Court looks only to precedents.

The President's bill is proposed for the purpose of giving new blood to that Court so they can look forward instead of backward; so they can use science, knowledge, and progress instead of looking back to such decisions as were rendered in the Dred Scott case.

I want to make this statement so it will not be misunderstood: There are a great many thousands of good people who really believe that their liberties will be destroyed if a few more Judges are put on the Supreme Court. It is not in any way true. But there really are people who believe that.

Let us study at the background. For instance, let us take the Sons of the American Revolution. People are afraid to get up and say what they think about societies which are allegedly patriotic organizations.

MESSMORE KENDALL, OF SONS OF REVOLUTION, MESSES THINGS UP SOME MORE

The great president general of the Sons of the American Revolution is a man named Messmore Kendall—and this is one time he has messed something up. He is sending out secret telegrams to his Sons of the American Revolution all over the United States telling them to send wires to their Representatives in Congress contesting this perfectly constitutional plan and saying that it will break down the Constitution.

Now, who is Mr. Messmore Kendall? Messmore Kendall is a Republican, and that is all right. He is a Hoover Republican, and that is still all right, although I prefer Roosevelt Democrats. But he is also president of the Sons of the American Revolution, and he is using his high office in that organization to play Republican politics.

There is your kingpin of Sons of the American Revolution. Nobody can throw a rock at me and say that I am subverting the Government, because I am a member of that organization. If we travel around the country, we will find various and sundry organizations operating this way. It is an old American custom.

THE SAME OLD RACKET NOW AS BEFORE

I am not going to give the details of this, but in this country today the same thing is happening that happened when we were considering the holding-company bill; and that is that certain persons in New York and Chicago and St. Louis are wiring out to the country to wire their Congressmen to be against the judiciary bill. I know of one instance where a lady sent out 27 telegrams over the telephone and had them charged to her telephone bill. That is the way this thing is going.

ROOSEVELT'S APPOINTEES WILL CERTAINLY BE AS HONORABLE AS HARDING'S, HOOVER'S, OR COOLIDGE'S

Let us analyze that. In the first place I see no reason why if Mr. Roosevelt were to appoint, we will say six good Democrats to the Supreme Court and they hold up their right hand and swear before God to support the Constitution of the United States, that they would be any less honorable than if they had been appointed by Mr. Coolidge, Mr. Hoover, or by Mr. Harding. Those men will still be bound by the Constitution of the United States.

When we analyze this we find it is not worth all the fuss and row that has been made about it, for it is not going to lead to any phase of dictatorship whatsoever. It is absolutely constitutional. If the Liberty League objects to it let them get an amendment. .They are always talking about getting amendments—let them get the amendment.

GENERAL TREND AWAY FROM LIBERTY—LET US GET IT IN RIGHT DIRECTION

The general trend in this country has been away from representative government. If, after the Dred Scott case, Congress had had the opportunity to compromise slavery, war would have been averted, because Southerners and Northerners were satisfied with the compromise. Alexander Stephens said, "Pay us $400 a piece for these colored people." The Congress said, "No; the Supreme Court has said we cannot do it." Unconstitutional to save a nation from war! Had they done it they would have saved this Nation. The same thing faces us today as representatives of the people. We have a duty to perform and we ought to perform it.

The Republican Party was against Judge Taney and the Court because he was a Southerner and because he upheld slavery. That is what they said. Lincoln said he would reverse that decision, and he did reverse it.

How? By a four-and-a-half year bloody war.

My uncles, my grandfather, and other relatives fought these boys from Maine and the North. What are we going to do now? Shall we fall into economic destruction by representative government being destroyed, or shall we maintain democracy and hence our country? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, since the President has sent us his recommendations on judicial reform on February 5 we have had much discussion here on the floor as well as in the press and over the radio, giving many of the different views and angles of this most important question.

I consider this the most important question that we will have before us during our lifetime, notwithstanding the seriousness of the situation confronting the Nation in 1933, when this administration came into power. The people had had three reactionary "do nothing" administrations during the past 12 years under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, and it may safely be said that the people voted for a change in 1932. We all remember the chaotic conditions confronting the Nation in March 1933, with the banks closed, 14,000,000 unemployed, city and farm foreclosures totaling thousands daily, fear gripping the hearts of everyone, and nothing being done in Washington to correct these chaotic conditions, the people voted for a change; they got what they voted for and plenty of action with it.

Under the leadership of President Roosevelt the Congress speedily enacted a program that reopened our banks on a safe and sound basis, restored confidence in the hearts of the people by starting a great public-works program, millions were reemployed and under a well-rounded legislative program worked out and enacted for the benefit of the farmer, laborer, merchant, and in fact all of those in all walks of life were benefited, and things began to "hum" in every direction. Smiles replaced the frowns and happiness and reemployment again came into the homes of our people.

COMPARISON 1933 WITH 1936

Let me give a summary of the conditions when we came into power in 1933 and then compare those conditions with the last figures available.

In order that we may have the clear picture of the progress made we must remember as has been demonstrated here on the floor this afternoon, we still have our reactionary critics who are always ready to criticise and belittle our efforts and the great progress made, and they are always ready to misstate the facts in any and every way possible in order to try to deceive the people.

Now, let me refer to some of the surest signs of recovery. These figures are furnished by the National Emergency Council. First take the Internal Revenue collections for the United States:

	Calendar year 1933	Calendar year 1936
Individual	$375,284,302	$739,932,288
Corporation	345,174,354	811,720,307
Miscellaneous	1,229,925,376	2,232,537,753
Agricultural Adjustment Administration taxes	140,563,245	3,145,712
Total	2,090,947,277	3,787,336,060

81 percent increase reported by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Department of the Treasury.

New passenger-car registrations

Registrations:
Calendar year 1933 ---- 1,493,794
Calendar year 1936 ---- 3,404,497
One hundred and twenty-eight percent increase.
As reported by the R. L. Polk Co., received from Automotive Division, Department of Commerce.

Bank deposits, exclusive of interbank deposits, all banks

Amount on deposit:
Call date:
June 30, 1933 ---- $38,011,000,000
June 30, 1936 ---- 51,335,000,000
Thirty-five percent increase.

Gross postal receipts, exclusive of money orders

Amount:
Fiscal year 1933 ---- $563,355,804
Fiscal year 1936 ---- 633,166,235
Twelve percent increase.

Domestic money orders issued

Amount:
1933 ---- $1,654,961,826
1936 ---- 1,927,424,982
Sixteen percent increase.

Value of residential building contracts

	Calendar year 1933	Calendar year 1936	Percent
Number of contracts	40,486	83,906	107
Value of contracts	$249,262,100	$801,623,800	221

Veal calves	Hundredweight	4.57	7.83
Lambs	Hundredweight	4.78	7.26
Milk	Hundredweight	1.31	2.10

Thus it will be seen from the above comparison of conditions existing in 1933 and 1936 that the condition of those in all walks of life has been tremendously improved. Revenue collections because of increased incomes have nearly doubled. More than 5,000,000 unemployed have been reemployed, farmers' incomes nearly doubled, and business in general has shown a tremendous improvement.

COMPARISON OF 1933 WITH 1936 FOR TEXAS

Before I go any further, let me insert in the RECORD at this point the same information for Texas that the Emergency Council has furnished me for the Nation.

CRITICS ANSWERED

These records should answer the carping critics who still can see nothing good in the wonderful program worked out and enacted into law under this administration; but for some time we have realized that all is not quiet on the Potomac, that our critics have managed to continue their barrage of criticism and, through their government by injunction, have managed to almost completely block the administration's power program designed to furnish cheap electricity to every farm and home in America.

I will now undertake to point out as I go along not only how the power program of this administration has been nullified by the Supreme Court decisions, but will call to your attention how the tax burden has been shifted largely from the rich to the poor through the decisions of the Supreme Court.

LOWER LIGHT RATES

It is well known that this is the first administration we have had in Washington that has really tried to regulate the power industry and set up power yardsticks throughout the Nation whereby the people can know first-hand how cheaply electricity may be generated and distributed for their use. Under the Tennessee Valley Authority and other power projects under construction throughout the Nation, it has been demonstrated that electric current can be produced and furnished the people in quantity lots for less than 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, and what the Tennessee Valley Authority has meant to that 500-mile radius, the Brazos and Colorado River Authorities should mean the same cheap electric current for Texas and that section of the country.

POWER PROGRAM SABOTAGED

Let me insert at this point a letter just received from Col. Horatio B. Hackett, Assistant Administrator of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, in answer to an inquiry I made concerning the latest injunction suit filed by the Electric Bond & Share Co. enjoining the construction of a municipal light plant loan and grant made by the Government for the city of Electra, Tex.:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1937.

Hon. W. D. MCFARLANE,
Member of Congress.

MY DEAR MR. MCFARLANE: In response to your telephonic request of Mr. Clark Foreman regarding the status of the allotment to Electra, Tex., our docket Texas 2004 p–d, I can inform you that any payment of funds for this project has been restrained by order of the District Court of the District of Columbia. This order was issued February 12.

In response to your further question, this order of the court brings up to $27,491,863 the amount of money which is held in suspense by court injunction against P. W. A. Altogether, 53 projects are in this category, with 4 in addition on which injunctions have been modified to allow a limited amount of work to proceed. It is estimated that these injunctions are preventing 20,847 people from being employed on the projects, and approximately 80,000 more from being employed in the production and transportation of the various materials which would be necessary for the construction.

A good many additional projects have been enjoined but, because of the expense and delay of the litigation, or for other reasons, the applicants have withdrawn their applications and the allotments have been rescinded. Injunctions have been granted in other cases even before an allotment has been made.

Based on an actual study of six completed P. W. A. power projects made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, more than four men were employed indirectly on these projects for every one employed on the site. These projects were steam or Diesel plants, whereas some of the enjoined allotments are for hydro plants and for the hydro plants the ratio would not be so high. However, the general ratio for all P. W. A. has been found by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to be 2.5 employed off the site for every one employed on the site.

It was hoped that litigation on these projects would have been settled by a Supreme Court decision in the Duke Power Co. v. Greenwood County case. This case was heard by the Supreme Court last fall but no decision was made on the merits as the Supreme Court found that the lower courts had made certain procedural errors; and therefore this case, which had already been in the courts for nearly 3 years, was returned to the district court of South Carolina for retrial.

In all four of the cases of this nature that have been decided by the circuit courts of appeal, the decision has been in favor of the Government. Every effort is being made to get another case before the Supreme Court this term, but at present there is little prospect of achieving this as the nearest cases are two which were heard before the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia on February 15. Judging by the delays which have faced this type of litigation in the past, that will not allow time for this case to get to the Supreme Court this term, and therefore there is probably no likelihood of getting a decision on them before next Christmas, even if further procedural technicalities are not discovered in those cases.

In this connection, I think I should add that the procedural errors which caused the Supreme Court to remand the Greenwood County case were not due to any fault of the Government attorneys and they were not points raised by either side in the litigation. All the evidence either side had desired to introduce was before the Supreme Court at that time; but the Court sent the case back, saying that there was "no exigency"—although the consequent delay means, as above noted, that thousands of persons will remain unemployed. Needless to say, the P. W. A. will continue to push this litigation with all speed, as we are very desirous of having the question determined one way or the other so that the money which Congress has appropriated may serve the purpose for which Congress appropriated it.

Sincerely yours,

HORATIO B. HACKETT,
Assistant Administrator.

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION

A recent document published by the Government gives the number and result of the injunctions that have been issued against municipal and public projects throughout the country during recent years. The title is "Restraining Orders and Injunctions Instituted Against Public Electric Projects" (S. Doc. 182, 74th Cong., 2d sess). This study shows that there have been 278 petitions for injunctions filed against 195 public authorities in the United States.

It further shows that the delays caused by 246 of these suits amounted to nearly 290 years—289 years 8 months and 22 days, to be exact.

That the total direct cost of these suits in 198 cases amounted to $376,233.

That the total indirect cost of 162 of these cases amounted to $11,920,207.

There are 91 of these public authorities that have not yet been able to build their plants.

The greatest amount of indirect expense reported for any single municipality is Camden, N. Y., $2,838,888.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that I have offered legislation that I believe, if enacted into law, will greatly relieve the strangle hold the Power Trust now has through injunctions upon practically all the power projects approved by this administration throughout this Nation.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Duke Power Co. et al. against Greenwood County et al. read in the light of their decision on the Tennessee Valley Authority and other power projects, leaves little hope of any legislation we can enact that will stand the test of the Supreme Court on the power question.

You will remember that in 1930 the Supreme Court held, in a utility rate case, that anything less than 7½ (7.44) percent per year was confiscatory; and under the power set-up in the Nation, as shown from the records, the utilities have been allowed to earn $1,000,000,000 annually in excess of the Tennessee Valley Authority yardstick rate. Thus, for the past 6 years alone the Power Trust has been able to earn more than $6,000,000,000 in excess of the Tennessee Valley Authority rates under which the T. V. A. is furnishing citizens of that area electric current at about 30-percent profit, based on T. V. A. rates. Based on the excessive rates charged throughout the Nation for telephone, telegram, gas, and transportation services, as compared with the excessive rates charged by the power interests, you have a clear picture of what the Supreme Court, through its decisions, has allowed all the different utilities to get by with in their excessive charges for each and all of these services.

ANTITRUST LAWS INVALIDATED

In order to prevent small industries from being crushed by the giants of monopoly Congress in 1890 passed the Sherman antitrust law to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies. The first real legal test on this act came before the Supreme Court in 1895 and involved the sugar interests (U. S. v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1). For all practical purposes the Supreme Court admitted that a monopoly exists. According to the findings of the Court the American Sugar Refining Co. had acquired the stock of four Philadelphia refineries and by this act had, to use the words of the Court itself, "acquired nearly complete control of the manufacture of refined sugar within the United States." Notwithstanding this fact, the Court made a unique decision that the acts of the parties "bore no direct relation to commerce between the States or with foreign nations." By making the absurd holding that such a combination had no direct relation to commerce, the Supreme Court successfully clipped the power of Congress to outlaw monopolies and based on the Tariff Commission reports and other information available the consumers of sugar are paying about 100 millions of dollars annually to the sugar monopoly in excess of what other nations are paying for sugar. Later in 1904 when Theodore Roosevelt attempted to bust the monopolistic trusts of the country the Supreme Court came to the rescue of certain large corporations and saved them from the penalties of the antitrust laws and assured all corporations of such magnitude and power that they had nothing to fear, that only their corporations were liable, and that, of course, corporations cannot be sent to jail.

CLAYTON ACT VOIDED

After the Supreme Court emasculated the Sherman Antitrust Act Congress passed new legislation in 1914 in what was known as the Clayton Antitrust Act and at the same time created the Federal Trade Commission. However, Congress was soon to discover that it could not keep pace with the destructive decisions of the Supreme Court. The Clayton Act soon followed the Sherman Act into the Supreme Court's wastebasket. The first decision involved the Carnegie Steel Co., and the Supreme Court overruled the decision of the Federal Trade Commission and supported the Carnegie Steel Co. (Federal Trade Commission v. Warren, Jones and Gratz, 253 U. S. 542).

Later it again struck at the Clayton Act in the case of the Curtis Publishing Co. (Federal Trade Commission v. Curtis Publishing Co., 262 U. S. 568), though it was alleged the contracts of that company were admittedly producing monopolistic practices in violation of the Clayton Act. This was followed by the decision of the Court holding that the Federal Trade Commission had no power to prevent fraudulent or deceptive advertising (283 U. S. 643).

Under the leadership of the present Chief Justice the Court has continued to nullify the efforts of the Federal Trade Commission and the Sherman Act. In a decision favoring the Standard Oil Co. the Court held that cross licensing of patents and pooling of royalties were not in violation of the legislation against monopolies (Standard Oil Company v. U. S., 283 U. S. 163).

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION NULLIFIED

In 1896 the Supreme Court began its attack upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, which had been established in 1887 to give the people a fair break on railroad rates. By this action the Court restored to the railroad a right to practically fix rates thus outlawing years of efforts by the people of the country to obtain fairer and more just railroad rates. From that day to this the Interstate Commerce Commission has never exercised the protective powers which it was intended they should have in order to protect the people from being plundered by the large corporations (Maximum Freight rate case, 167 U. S. 479).

RAILROAD RATES ALL TRAFFIC WILL BEAR

In determining the rates to be charged by the railroads the Supreme Court has required that consideration be given to reproduction costs and not to the amount of capital invested in the enterprise. In other words, though the owners of a railroad may have only $10,000,000 invested in it, if it would today cost $20,000,000 to build the railroad, the $20,000,000 figure (and not the $10,000,000) is considered in fixing the rates. However, this rule which was laid down in 1925 in the O'Fallon case (St. Louis & O'Fallon R. R. Co. v. U. S., 279 U. S. 461), when values were increasing, does not work both ways. A decrease in value does not serve to decrease the rates, so the people learned when the Court refused to allow a reduction in public utility rates by reason of the decrease in values due to the depression (West v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 295 U. S. 662), and a still further scuttling of the Interstate Commerce Commission was recently made by the Supreme Court when it failed to protect the bondholders by nullifying an order of the Commission designed to prevent excessive reorganization fees in the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad reorganization. This decision was the Supreme Court's gift to the lawyers and the others who thrive upon the fat fees allowed them in reorganizing corporations which are in financial difficulties, such persons being the only ones who derive any profit out of the reorganization (U. S. v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R., 283 U. S. 840).

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

A good deal has been said to the effect that the Supreme Court is necessary for the protection of our fundamental rights such as freedom of the press and freedom of speech.

The truth of the matter is that the courts are the ones which, without limitation, may throttle the press and the people in expressing their opinions. If a State imposes a tax upon newspapers the Court invalidates the tax on the alleged ground that it violates the freedom of the press. If a State passes an act to prevent a newspaper from publishing "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory" matter, the act is declared invalid by the Supreme Court. In other words, a newspaper can do just about anything it wants to do by way of malicious and defamatory publication, but if it points a gentle finger at the courts, that is an entirely different proposition, for the courts have taken unto themselves the power of supervising the press. If anyone has any question on this point let him look at the decision of the Supreme Court in Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States, 247 U. S. 402. In that case the Toledo News-Bee very vigorously expressed its opinion with respect to a suit brought by the creditors of a street railway to restrain the enforcement of a city ordinance with respect to the fares to be charged. For such expression the newspaper and its editor were held for contempt of court.

TRIAL BY JURY

The significance of a contempt proceeding is that the party has no right to a jury trial, so the courts have held. In other words, the judge who holds a person for contempt of court is also the one who decides the case without giving the accused a jury trial. Following this procedure in the Toledo case, the judge found the editor guilty of contempt of court, despite the fact that it was not shown or found that any of the publications complained of was brought into the court room or court building or read by the judge. This star chamber procedure by which the court throttles the press was sustained by the United States Supreme Court, and yet today there are persons who think that the Supreme Court is a protector of the freedom of the press.

HOURS AND WAGES LEGISLATION NULLIFIED

The Supreme Court's decision in the case of Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (295 U. S. 495), in which the Court held that the N. R. A. was an improper delegation of power by Congress and an unlawful attempt to regulate intrastate commerce, was the death knell to legislation by the Congress to regulate hours and wages.

Then when we consider the case of Atkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U. S. 525), wherein the Supreme Court killed the minimum-wage law for the District of Columbia, holding that a board to fix minimum wages for women to protect their health and morals violates due process of law, and last year in Moorehead v. New York (298 U. S. 597) the Court by another 5-to-4 decision nullified New York State's minimum-wage law, which had been on the statute books for more than 10 years.

So thus we find the Supreme Court holds that hours and wages cannot be regulated by Federal statute, and that the State has no power to regulate hours and wages by State statute. Then the question arises, Who has the power to regulate hours and wages?

SIT-DOWN STRIKERS

This administration carefully worked out a program to protect the innocent public from fraudulent sales of worthless securities, and the big brokers and stock salesmen refused to be bound by it and filed injunction suits. We enacted a program to regulate and eliminate useless holding companies in the power industry and the utilities refused to be bound by it, and filed injunction suits. We enacted legislation to regulate hours and wages and to adjust labor disputes and those affected refused to be bound by it, and filed injunction suits. In other words, they went on sit-down strikes and refused to obey the laws of Congress, and each and all of these economist royalists are now looking to the Supreme Court to approve of their "sit-down strike", and the Supreme Court in the legislation they have so far reached have given their approval by declaring invalid the N. R. A., A. A. A., the Guffey Coal Act, and many other important pieces of legislation, and thus have nullified many important acts of Congress. But when the laboring man, because of the Supreme Court's decisions nullifying all State and Federal legislation to regulate hours and wages and working conditions, takes upon himself to engage in the same sit-down strike started by big business, he is bitterly condemned by the subsidized press Nation-wide. This sit-down strike business is wrong for both sides, for both capital and labor, and should not be tolerated. It is to be hoped that respect for law and order by all parties concerned will be given more consideration in the immediate future.

CANNOT REGULATE CHILD LABOR

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that Congress has the power to regulate commerce, lottery, obscene literature, diseased cattle, persons, impure food or drugs, and so forth. However, in 1918 the Court in another 5-to-4 decision held invalid the child-labor law closing the channels of interstate commerce to the products of child labor, and we have sought since 1918 to amend the Constitution to stop child labor, and now have finally secured the approval of only 28 of the necessary 36 States for such an amendment.

Yet the economic royalists and our misguided theorists would have you believe that the only way to change the complexion of the Supreme Court is through constitutional amendment rather than through statutory enactment as recommended by the President. It took from 1895 to 1913 to reenact the clearly written income-tax provision of the Constitution the Supreme Court had nullified, and it will take at least that long to enact the child-labor amendment. No short-cut method of amendment has yet been suggested that has stood the "guess" of the Supreme Court. And as suggested by Thomas Jefferson when he said:

> Our case is the more desperate as the attempt to make the law by amendment is only throwing out new amendments for sophistry.

The Constitution is written in such clear, understandable language that even the Supreme Court should be able to understand it. However, since they have through hair-splitting, 5-to-4 decisions nullified many provisions as above quoted from Thomas Jefferson, why throw out new amendments for them to nullify? What we need is new blood which will fairly interpret the Constitution as written.

CANNOT LEGISLATE FOR THE WELFARE OF THE MASSES

The Supreme Court struck down the Farm Moratorium Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act with the same ease that they voided the Railroad Pension Act, the Municipal Bankruptcy Act, and the Guffey Coal Act, in each of which cases three or four Judges dissented. There is now little doubt in the mind of Congress but what the Supreme Court will nullify the Wheeler-Rayburn Holding Company Act, the Wagner-Connery Labor Relations Act, the Social Security Act, and other important acts just as soon as they reach them. Then here we are—a great party, with the largest Democratic majority in Congress in the history of the Nation; with the greatest President we have ever had, showing the most courageous leadership—and yet we are blocked largely by the same crowd that has been repudiated at the polls in the last three elections.

CAN LEGISLATE FOR THE WELFARE OF THE CLASSES—INCOME TAX

Mr. Chairman, let me now call to your attention some more decisions of the Supreme Court in which they have taken plain, simple language and have nullified our tax laws which have benefited the rich at the expense of the poor, running into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Take, first, the case of Collector v. Day (11 Wall. 813 (Apr. 3, 1871)). The Court in this case held that the Federal Government held no authority to subject to the income tax the salary of any State official or employee, and later decisions have reaffirmed same, to date, thereby losing $165,000,000 to the Government.

Next, take the case of Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (151 U. S. 429; 158 U. S. 601). In this case the Court held our income-tax law invalid even before it had had an opportunity to function. However, from income-tax returns filed before the nullification of the law on May 20, 1895, the Government records show:

	Number of returns	Amount
Persons	48,672	$6,128,051.45
Corporations	29,653	9,815,697.24

It is estimated that had this income-tax law been allowed to function, even though the tax was very small, only 2 percent, with an exemption of $4,000 for individuals, it is estimated that the Government during the interim from 1895 to 1913 lost a revenue on the law as written amounting to more than $100,000,000 per year, or more than $1,800,000,000 in revenue.

In 1895 the New York World listed the income of the millionaires of New York, which showed that 54 persons had an income of $79,344,250. Thus with a 2-percent tax these 54 persons alone would have paid nearly $2,000,000 in income tax. Yet these and thousands of other persons and corporations throughout the Nation escaped the payment of any income tax for nearly 20 years because of this decision.

THE 1913 INCOME-TAX AMENDMENT

This 1913 income-tax amendment permits taxation of income from whatever source derived. Despite this broad language the Supreme Court has repeatedly restricted its scope. In the case of Eisner v. Macomber (125 U. S. 189) the Court held that stock dividends were not subject to income taxation, and over a period of 16 years thus lost to the Government $1,060,000,000 in revenue. In other words, if a person has a net income of $5,000, he must pay an income tax on it unless he is a State, county, or municipal employee, or comes under other exemption. However, a corporation with the same $5,000 net income can issue stock dividends and thus avoid payment of any income tax.

The Court has held that Congress cannot tax interest on bonds issued by State, county, or other local subdivisions. This act created a large field of tax-exempt securities, and this decision rendered despite the fact that Chief Justice Hughes as Governor of New York opposed the amendment, but as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court continues to adhere to the decision that Congress has no power to tax such bonds. The amount of securities from which the income is wholly exempt as a result of the Supreme Court action runs into billions. The figures for the 12 years, 1925 to 1936, are as follows:

Amount of securities

1925	$16,645,000,000
1926	17,636,000,000
1927	18,846,000,000
1928	19,892,000,000
1929	20,957,000,000
1930	23,785,000,000
1931	25,750,000,000
1932	28,456,000,000
1933	31,804,000,000
1934	34,400,000,000
1935	36,146,000,000
1936	37,611,000,000
Total	311,828,000,000

The estate-tax and gift-tax decisions of the Supreme Court has cost the Government many millions of dollars in losses of revenue. During the period 1920–27 Congress appropriated the following sums for income-tax refunds to persons and corporations:

Mar. 6, 1920 (refund to Charles I. Freer estate)	$1,000,000
May 29, 1920	12,000,000
Mar. 3, 1921	4,435,000
Mar. 3, 1921	12,000,000
Dec. 15, 1921	24,849,000
Feb. 17, 1922	12,000,000
July 1, 1922	28,122,500
Jan. 3, 1923	12,000,000
Jan. 22, 1923	42,430,000
Apr. 2, 1924	105,467,000
Apr. 4, 1924	12,000,000
Dec. 5, 1924	16,140,000
Jan. 20, 1925	150,000,000
Mar. 3, 1926	488,000
Mar. 3, 1926	$149,250,000
Feb. 28, 1927	175,000,000
Total	757,181,500

The Court has held stamp tax on foreign bills of lading was unconstitutional (Fairbanks v. United States, 181 U. S. 283).

The income from oil land leased by a State to a private corporation is not subject to an income tax (Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U. S. 398).

JUDGES' PENSIONS, YES; WORKERS' PENSIONS, NO

In the case of Railroad Retirement Board v. The Alton R. R. Co. et al (295 U. S. 330), by a 5-to-4 decision the Railroad Old-Age Pension Act was nullified, and the decision of the Court is in language which makes it impossible to write a valid pension law.

In the case of Evans v. Gore (253 U. S. 245), the Supreme Court held that salaries of judges of all constitutional courts are not subject to payment of any income tax. This exempts the salary of the Judges of the Supreme Court or other courts of appeal and all Federal district judges.

And when we passed the economy bill, reducing all Federal employees' salaries 15 percent, the Court, in the case of O'Donoghue v. United States (289 U. S. 516), held that the salaries of all judges of the above-named courts are exempt not only from income tax but were not subject to reduction under the economy bill. Moreover, all salaries of all retired or pensioned judges of all these courts are not subject to income tax or any salary reductions.

Mr. Chairman, let me summarize some of the decisions of the Supreme Court above cited, showing the amount of money that has been lost in revenue to the Government.

Decision	Issue	Loss in revenue
Collector v. Day	Taxability of State, county, and municipal employees.	$165,000,000
Pollock case	Power to tax income	1,800,000,000
Eisner v. McComber	Stock dividends	1,060,000,000
National Life Insurance Co	Reduction allowance for reserves by tax-exempt interest.	97,500,000
Railroad Retirement Act	Constitutionality of act	100,000,000
Neiner v. Donnan	Gift in contemplation of death	5,000,000
Nichols v. Coolidge	do	10,000,000
Blodgett v. Holden	Gift tax	3,500,000
Guffey Coal Act	Constitutionality of act	1,000,000
Agricultural Adjustment Act	do	1,017,000,000
May v. Heiner	Creation of trusts	25,000,000
Power rate cases 6-year loss		6,000,000,000
Total		10,290,000,000

A complete showing of all cases, including a study of all excessive utility rates permitted under the Supreme Court decisions, it is believed on good authority, would more than double this amount.

STATES' RIGHTS

Our critics, in some places, strongly urge States' rights. Last year the Supreme Court, in the case of the Great Northern Railway Co. v. Weeks (297 U. S. 135), held that the local assessment of property tax cannot be made without possibility of being declared invalid by the Supreme Court.

Similar decisions covering almost every conceivable subject limiting States' rights have been nullified by the Supreme Court lawmaking body.

JUDICIAL SUPREMACY

Chief Justice Hughes was right when he said:

> We are under a Consitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is.

I have always been of the opinion that that great jurist, the late Oliver Wendell Holmes, was right when he said:

> I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States. For one in my place sees how often a local policy prevails with those who are not trained to national views, and how often action is taken that embodies what the commerce clause was meant to end.

Not only has the Supreme Court with deadening regularity paralyzed the work of this administration through their political decisions declaring the economic policies of a past decade and generation that has thrice been repudiated at the polls of the Nation, and each time by increased majorities, and in the face of this crisis the economic royalists or critics of the past three campaigns are now bitterly fighting, bringing forth every possible false issue to try to mislead the American people on the President's judicial reform program.

THE PRESIDENT RECOMMENDS

Let us examine the President's proposal. It states:

(a) When any judge of a court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, has heretofore or hereafter attained the age of 70 years and has held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years, continuously or otherwise, and within 6 months thereafter has neither resigned nor retired, the President, for each judge who has not so resigned or retired, shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint one additional judge to the court to which the former is commissioned. Provided, That no additional judge shall be appointed hereunder if the judge who is of retirement age dies, resigns, or retires prior to the nomination of such additional judge.

(b) No more than 50 judges shall be appointed thereunder, nor shall any judge be so appointed if such appointment would result in "(1) more than 15 members of the Supreme Court of the United States", (2) more than 2 additional members so appointed to a circuit court of appeals, the Court of Claims, the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, or the Customs Court, or (3) more than twice the number of judges now authorized to be appointed for any district or, in the case of judges appointed for more than one district, for any such group of districts.

Thus we find as clearly stated in the above proviso that no additional judge will be appointed when this legislation is enacted when the present judge who is eligible under the Retirement Act to resign or retire from service does resign or retire. It seems to be generally conceded that the six judges eligible for retirement with full pay for the remainder of their lives will probably retire upon the passage of this act should their retirement not come beforehand. But should they not retire the Court will be increased to 15 judges.

NEW JUDGES NEEDED

According to the message of the President and report of the Attorney General, 87 percent of the cases presented by private litigants last year to the Supreme Court were denied without even an expression of any kind of a written report filed. In other words, about seven out of eight cases last year filed by private litigants were denied without hearings or written opinions. And in the light of the written opinions filed the past 7 years by the six judges eligible for retirement, the records show these judges have averaged examining the following number of cases per year:

	Salary
Chief Justice Hughes, age 74, 24 cases	$20,500
Justice Van Devanter, aged 77, 4 cases	20,000
Justice McReynolds, age 75, 16 cases	20,000
Justice Brandeis, age 80, 16 cases	20,000
Justice Sutherland, age 74, 17 cases	20,000
Justice Butler, age 70, 18 cases	20,000

Thus we find from the record, if the litigants before the Supreme Court are to have their cases properly considered that there is ample need for more judges on the Supreme Court, or of younger judges capable of doing more work. The President makes the same recommendation for expediting the Court's business in the district, circuit, claims, and customs courts, as well as the Supreme Court, as to age and retirement. No one has suggested that he is wrong in his recommendations in regard to these courts, except as to the Supreme Court, where the age is greater and the average length of service longest. Some of the gentlemen preceding me stated there is no precedent for such action. Let us look at the record. The Court was created in 1789 with six members. It was reduced in 1801 to 5 members; it was increased to 7 members in 1807; it was increased to 9 in 1837; it was increased to 10 in 1863; it was reduced to 7 in 1866; it was increased to 9 in 1869.

Each of the above changes was a political move by the administration in power to change the Court to give their administration some political advantage.

MORE PRECEDENTS

Mr. Chairman, our critics should at least try and be fair. They know, as we all know, that for many years under civil-service law all Federal employees are retired at 70 years; in the Army and Navy all officers are retired at 64. And the plutocrats who are now leading the fight against the President's Court proposals nearly all refuse to employ people in their plants who have passed the age of 45 years. So, in the light of these and many other precedents, our critics should be the last to complain.

HOUSE OF LORDS INCREASED

In England the House of Lords has been increased on different occasions to enact important legislation to serve the Government. Certainly a crisis has arisen in this country and the time has come when action is necessary now if we are to serve this country for the masses of the people who have made it. Our critics argue that we are trying to "pack" the Supreme Court without any opportunity for the people of the country to express themselves on this question.

THE CAMPAIGN ISSUE

Certainly the opposition made the Supreme Court an important issue in the last campaign throughout the Nation. The President in answering our critics, particularly in his Madison Square Garden speech, called to the attention of the voters of the Nation the unfinished business yet to be carried out. The President, in this speech, said in part:

Our vision for the future contains more than promises. This is our answer to those who, silent about their own plans, ask us to state our objectives.

Of course, we will continue to seek to improve working conditions for the workers of America—to reduce hours overlong, to increase wages that spell starvation, to end the labor of children, to wipe out sweatshops. Of course, we will continue every effort to end monopoly in business, to support collective bargaining, to stop unfair competition, to abolish dishonorable trade practices. For all these we have only just begun to fight.

Of course, we will continue to work for cheaper electricity in the homes and on the farms of America, for better and cheaper transportation, for low interest rates, for sounder home financing, for better banking, for the regulation of security issues, for reciprocal trade among nations, for the wiping out of slums. For all these we have only just begun to fight.

Of course, we will continue our efforts in behalf of the farmers of America. With their continued cooperation we will do all in our power to end the piling up of huge surpluses which spelled ruinous prices for their crops. We will persist in successful action for better land use, for reforestation, for the conservation of water all the way from its source to the sea, for drought and flood control, for better marketing facilities for farm commodities, for a definite reduction of farm tenancy, for encouragement of farmer cooperatives, for crop insurance, and a stable food supply. For all these we have only just begun to fight.

Of course, we will provide useful work for the needy unemployed; we prefer useful work to the pauperism of a dole.

Of course, we will continue our efforts for young men and women, so that they may obtain an education and an opportunity to put it to use. Of course, we will continue our help for the crippled, for the blind, for the mothers—our insurance for the unemployed—our security for the aged. Of course, we will continue to protect the consumer against unnecessary price spreads, against the costs that are added by monopoly and speculation. We will continue our successful efforts to increase his purchasing power and to keep it constant.

For these things, too, and for others like them we have only just begun to fight.

This speech was clearly in keeping with the Democratic platform of 1936, which said:

We have sought, and will continue to seek, to meet these problems through legislation within the Constitution.

And let me call to your attention that none of our critics have seriously contended that the President's court proposals are in any way unconstitutional.

UNPACKING THE COURT

So in reply to our critics who charge us with packing the Court, we answer that we desire to unpack the Court which has been packed against the rights of the masses and in favor of the classes for many, many years, as is shown by the kind and character of decisions they have rendered. "By their works ye shall know them."

GOVERNMENT BY JUDGES OR BY REPRESENTATIVES OF PEOPLE

The great issue confronting us at this time is whether or not we shall permit the judiciary to continue to be the legislative and policy-making department of the Government. Our forefathers when they wrote the Constitution clearly defined the powers and duties of the three departments of Government and left all remaining power in the hands of the people.

ARTICLE IX (AMENDMENT)

Article 9 of the Constitution provides:

The numeration, in the Constitution, of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

During the debate in the Constitutional Convention on four different occasions, June 4th, 6th, July 21st, and August 15th, 1787, James Madison and Alexander Hamilton tried to write into the Constitution provisions giving the Supreme Court the power to declare acts of Congress invalid, without success. Instead our forefathers did carefully provide in the Constitution how our laws should be enacted.

LAWMAKING

Article 1, section 7, provides how laws shall be enacted, as follows:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall before it becomes a law—

Be declared valid by the Supreme Court? No—

be presented to the President of the United States. If he approves, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall be reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

You will note, by carefully reading the Constitution, that nowhere in it do you find any power granting the Supreme Court the right to declare acts of Congress invalid.

POWERS OF CONGRESS

Article 1, section 8, provides the powers of Congress, as follows:

The Congress shall have power—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;

To establish post offices and post roads;

To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;

To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;

To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations;

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years;

To provide and maintain a navy;

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings; and

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

POWERS OF THE SUPREME COURT

The powers of the Supreme Court are clearly set forth in the Constitution in article III, sections 1 and 2, and article VI and article XI (amendment), which read as follows:

ARTICLE III

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and facts, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

ARTICLE VI

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

ARTICLE XI (AMENDMENT)

The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

The Judiciary Act enacted into law by the Congress on September 24, 1889, carrying into effect the above-quoted provisions clearly show how the Congress then and ever since then has regarded the delegated powers of the Constitution. Section 25 reads as follows:

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity, or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the Constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be reexamined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice or judge or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court, and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision as before provided, may at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same and award execution. But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid than such as appears on the face of the record and immediately respects the before-mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said Constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.

Thus you will note from the last section of article III, section 2, that the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction of the cases above referred to "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

And under section 25 of the Judicial Code you will note that the Congress has never given any Federal court the power of declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional. This power has been usurped entirely by the Supreme Court without any legal right.

OUR FOREFATHERS' INTENTIONS

Thus we find clearly stated in simple language the powers of Congress as well as the Supreme Court. The preamble of the Constitution should throw some light on what our forefathers' intentions were. The preamble states:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

You will note the clause "promote the general welfare" in the preamble, also in article I, section 8, of the Constitution, provides:

The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for the * * * general welfare of the United States.

The Supreme Court has gone out into the speculative of construing "due process of law", "equal protection of the laws", "equal privileges and immunities", "State's rights", "Federal powers", "implied powers", "emergency powers", "police powers", "legislative powers", "delegated powers", "administrative powers", "arbitrary and capricious powers", "governmental functions", "public purpose", "implied prohibitions", "property rights", "individual freedom", "interstate commerce", "special circumstances", "just and reasonable", and have followed off almost every other kind of economic policy and theory and subject they desired to write upon, but when it comes to the general-welfare clause, the rights of the downtrodden and underprivileged, they have never found time to even discover any such clause in the Constitution.

In many of their decisions they have taken plenty of pains to clearly limit article I, section 8, of the Constitution, which contains the welfare clause, as has been well pointed out by several eminent speakers on the floor of this House, including the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS], and others. But our critics take the position that someone should pass on the acts of Congress, and why not the Supreme Court, to which we the people reply, why not the duly elected representatives of the people—the Congress of the United States?

LAW-MAKING POWER

Our forefathers seriously debated that very question in the Constitutional Convention, and, as above shown, they decided to allow the Congress the right to write the laws and to allow the Supreme Court to have jurisdiction of the construction of the law, but all power not given to either department of government was to remain in the people—and why not? The Supreme Court under the Constitution is appointed for life, subject to removal for misbehavior, while the Congress each 2 years comes fresh from the people, and any law enacted that is unsatisfactory can be repealed by changing the Congress, if necessary, at the next election.

But if, as is the case before us, the Supreme Court, because of a wornout economic and political philosophy, through usurpation, declares, as they have done, acts of Congress invalid, there is no adequate way the people can remedy that situation other than the proposal now before us.

OATH TO SUPPORT THE CONSTITUTION

Our critics argue that the Supreme Court is under oath to support the Constitution; and so is the President and the Congress under the same oath, and I dare say both the President and Congress value their oath just as highly as do the members of the Supreme Court, and, being elected by the people and fresh from the people each 2 or 4 years, it seems that they should know better the wishes of the people than the nine men who were appointed for life, seven of whom were appointed by Republicans, a majority of whom were repudiated by their own people before they received such appointment, and their decisions show that they have lost step with the economic program and policy of the present day and generation. It was 14 years before the Supreme Court usurped the power of declaring invalid any act of Congress.

MARSHALL THE FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD

Then it was that Chief Justice Marshall, because of bitter political controversy between himself and Thomas Jefferson, through the pronouncement of obiter dictum in the case of Marbury against James Madison, declared an act of Congress invalid, affecting a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia.

Lawyer Marshall, the first, a few years before he was appointed to the bench, in the case of Ware v. Hilton (3 Dall. 211, 223), as an attorney for the defendant in that case, said:

> The legislative authority of any country can only be restrained by its own municipal constitution. This is a principle that springs from the very nature of society; and the judicial authority can have no right to question the validity of a law unless such a jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution.

Thus, he argued, the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to question the validity of any law unless expressly so given by the Constitution. However, Chief Justice Marshall, the second, in the Marbury case said:

> So, if a law be in opposition to the Constitution, if both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that the Court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the Constitution, or conformably to the Constitution, disregarding the law, the Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty. Thus the particular phraseology of the Constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the Constitution is void, and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

However, within 2 years after he wrote the Marbury against Madison opinion, Chief Justice Marshall, the third, wrote a letter to Justice Chase, who was under impeachment charges, then on the Supreme Bench, which letter has only recently become public.

In this letter Chief Justice Marshall appeals the claim of final authority in the courts to nullify acts of Congress, and in this letter from Chief Justice Marshall to Justice Chase he said:

> A reversal of those legal opinions deemed unsound by the Legislature would certainly better comport with the mildness of our character than the removal of the judge who has rendered them unknowing of his faults.

Now, since this opinion of Chief Justice Marshall is the first opinion and the basis upon which the Supreme Court has builded their stare decisis of opinions to date with almost unlimited jurisdiction of declaring acts of Congress invalid, and since Lawyer Marshall and Chief Justice Marshall so widely differ in their opinions, and since he nor none of his successors can point to any constitutional authority as a basis for voiding acts of Congress, then where, in truth and in fact, is the basis for any real sound argument?

During the first 75 years of our Republic, when our country was in its formative state, the Supreme Court declared but two acts of Congress invalid: Marbury against Madison and Scott against Sandford (the Dred Scott case).

Following the first decision, President Jefferson and his administration gave Marshall and his Federalist (reactionary) friends so much criticism that he dared not again attempt such a thing.

The Dred Scott decision drenched the Nation in blood in the Civil War.

Since the Civil War the Supreme Court, through their reckless usurpation of power, have broadened the scope of jurisdiction and powers until no one can tell how far they will go in remaking our laws to suit their own economic policies, if any.

I am convinced that we should act now to return our Government to the principles set forth in the Constitution. The Supreme Court should construe the Constitution in the light of the information available, under which it was written. We will then have the three separate and distinct departments of Government as set forth in the Constitution, the executive, legislative, and judicial, each working in its own sphere, cooperating with each other, as provided under the Constitution. When we enact legislation bringing about this result, we will have in truth and in fact a three-horse team pulling together and the field will be plowed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For personal services in the District of Columbia in connection with carrying out the provisions of the Emergency Banking Act, approved March 9, 1933 (48 Stat. 1), the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 337), the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1178), and any Executive orders, proclamations, and regulations issued under such acts, $30,000.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I did not want to see this portion of the pending bill passed by without making an observation or two relative to what I deem the silly silver policy we are pursuing at the present time.

I recall out of my high-school reading that Jason and his Argonauts pursued and finally found the golden fleece back in the days of Greek mythology, but under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 we have set a nation looking for the silver fleece, and it will never be found. As a matter of fact, it seems to me, day in and day out, we are receding further from the original quest.

May I remind you that under the Silver Purchase Act that was enacted by Congress in January, as I recall, of 1934 we mandated the Federal Treasury to buy enough silver to effect a ratio of 1 to 3 as against the gold monetary stock of this country?

Mr. LUDLOW. If the gentleman will permit, I think it was 1 to 4.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right; 1 to 4.

If you will examine the hearings on this matter you will find that the Secretary of the Treasury testified that on the 19th of June 1934 it would be necessary to buy 2,034,000,000 ounces of silver in order to effect this ratio. At that time the world price of silver was 44 cents an ounce. So he proceeded forthwith, under the mandate of the Congress, and began to make purchases, and up to the last of November 1936 he had actually purchased under the Silver Purchase Act 915,000,000 ounces at an average rate of 60 cents an ounce. In addition thereto we nationalized, under Executive order, 113,000,000 ounces that cost us 50 cents an ounce, and now when we look at the score, after having acquired more than 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver under the act of 1934, we still need 1,054,000,000 ounces before we effect this 1 to 4 ratio.

The singular thing is they started buying silver when it was 44 cents an ounce, and if you will look at the silver market today you will find that we have acquired in excess of 1,000,000,000 ounces and the market is back to 45 cents, while another singular thing is that the Federal Treasury today is buying newly mined silver for 78 cents an ounce.

A dentist in any constituency in this country can buy silver with which to fill teeth for 45 cents on the world market, but Uncle Sam continues to pay 78 cents for newly mined silver.

You tell me what kind of policy this is. You may ask, What is the reason for all this? The reason is simply this: The amount of gold we have in this country is not a constant quantity. It has been increasing by leaps and bounds to the point where today we have one-half of all the gold in the world. We have over eleven and a half billion dollars worth of gold at the present time and when the amount of gold in this country increases that means that the desired ratio of gold and silver recedes just a little further into the distance, and the Secretary of the Treasury must proceed, under this act, to buy silver until we effect this ratio of 1 to 4, or until the price reaches $1.29 an ounce. The price has been going down steadily, and this means that so long as the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 is on the statute books of this country the Federal Treasury is constrained to buy silver, and all it amounts to is simply a subsidy to a few silver mines in this country that are profiting by the disparity of 45 cents, which is the world price, and 78 cents, which is the price for domestic newly mined silver.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. TABER. And the Secretary's testimony indicated that the American Smelting & Refining Co. and the United States Smelting & Refining Co. were the chief profiteers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. How much did that subsidy amount to last year?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If you can buy on the world market all the silver you want for 45 cents and you are paying the mines 78 cents, the profit going to virtually two mining companies in the country today, it is the difference in price multiplied by the production, and the production has increased from 24,000,000 ounces in 1933 to over 63,000,000 ounces in 1936. We could put every silver miner in this country on relief and give him two or three thousand dollars outright and still be money ahead.

I do hope that some day this silly and fallacious policy will be expunged from the statute books of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] had the floor I tried to get him to answer yes or no as to whether the Democratic surpluses in the Post Office Department were figured exactly the same as the Republican deficits. Of course, being a lawyer, the gentleman would not answer yes or no.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. In just a moment.

Mr. TABER. I answered the gentleman that the deficit was $19,000,000 for 1936, which was direct and specific.

Mr. BIERMANN. In the 4 years or so I have been in this House I have noticed that the lawyers consistently and persistently refuse to answer yes or no, but they put everybody else on the stand and they want them to answer yes or no, while they themselves will never meet any question head-on.

I telephoned over to the Comptroller of the Post Office Department to get the figures, and I was informed by him that on June 9, 1930, a Republican Congress passed a law authorizing the Post Office Department to classify separately certain nonpostal items in figuring the matter of surpluses or deficits.

With this kind of figuring and with this kind of Republican bookkeeping during the last 3 Republican years the following figures were obtained; and, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to set out these figures in the form of a table in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Iowa that such consent must be obtained in the House.

Mr. BIERMANN. I shall give the figures for the fiscal years ending June 30. Take the three Republican years following the passage of the law of June 9, 1930. Ending June 30, 1931, the deficit was $98,500,000. Ending June 30, 1932, the deficit was $153,500,000, and ending June 30, 1933, the deficit was $48,000,000, making a total deficit under this Republican system of bookkeeping, under which they could subtract the nonpostal items, of $300,000,000 for these three Republican years. Now for the Democratic years. Under this Republican system of bookkeeping for 1934 the surplus was $12,000,000; for 1935, $5,000,000; and for 1936, when they got the 40-hour week in the Post Office Department, and the Post Office Department was thereby put to a greatly increased expense, the deficit was $17,000,000. In other words, for the three Democratic years, the Post Office Department has broken exactly even while under the last three Republican years it lost $300,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The reason for the difference is that the Democratic Administration has had the benefit of $100,000,000 a year growing out of the increase in the first-class postage rate from 2 cents to 3 cents.

Mr. BIERMANN. I never heard the amount estimated as large as that.

Mr. TABER. It is $100,000,000.

Mr. BIERMANN. A year or so ago it was stated at $78,000,000. Several gentlemen argued that it brought in less money.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The First Assistant Postmaster General testified before the committee that that constituted a net gain of $100,000,000, and that there would be practically no offset for any increase under a reversion to 2-cent postage.

Mr. BIERMANN. Did he mean to say that we would send just as many letters under a 3-cent postage as a 2-cent rate?

Mr. DIRKSEN. He said that the net loss to be suffered if we reverted to 2-cent postage would be $100,000,000.

Mr. BIERMANN. That surely is a matter of speculation, and my figures are not a matter of speculation. Here they are:

Fiscal years ending June 30

REPUBLICAN YEARS

1931, deficit	$98,500,000
1932, deficit	153,500,000
1933, deficit	48,000,000
Total deficit for 3 years	300,000,000

DEMOCRATIC YEARS

1934, surplus	$12,000,000
1935, surplus	5,000,000
1936, deficit	17,000,000

Under these 3 Democratic years the Post Office Department broke even—a net gain, under the same system of accounting, of $300,000,000 over the last 3 Republican years.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Coast Guard, exclusive of Office of the Commandant, $24,259,600: Provided, That not more than a total of $1,821,900 out of the appropriations contained in this act under the caption "Coast Guard" except the appropriations "Salaries, Office of the Commandant" and "Replacement airplanes", shall be expended for aviation: Provided further, That section 18 of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1934, is hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; and for the purpose of making such section applicable to such latter fiscal year, the figures "1934" shall be read as "1938."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that particular provision, beginning in line 10.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order so that I can make a statement?

Mr. SCOTT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have some understanding as to just what this would mean if this be stricken from the bill. Let us at least not do this in the dark. Let us look at the facts. Admiral Waesche, Commandant of the Coast Guard, said that this reenlistment gratuity would cost $412,896 in the Coast Guard. In the Navy it would cost approximately $2,400,000 and in the Army approximately $2,400,000. There would be some cost in the Marine Corps, the amount of which I am not advised. So that this would run something like $6,000,000 of a charge against the Federal Treasury every year, and it is testified, insofar as the Coast Guard is concerned, that 50 percent reenlist without this gratuity, so that it is not at all needed to get appropriate and suitable material for the Coast Guard.

Having said that, I have nothing more to say. I assume that perhaps it is subject to the point of order. I am sorry to see the point of order made. If the Chair can construe the Holman rule so as to obviate this point of order, I think it would be in the public service, but I will say that it is impossible to state how much money would be saved definitely. All that could be done is to estimate it. There is not the slightest doubt it would mean an enormous saving if we could go ahead without this reenlistment gratuity, but I cannot tell in dollars and cents how much would be saved.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is it not also true that there is a surplus in the upper grades of the Coast Guard, and that the Coast Guard Academy is graduating more men than are actually needed; and if this point of order is sustained, it will have a tendency, so far as the upper grades are concerned, to continue the surplus there and be a waste of the Government's funds?

Mr. LUDLOW. I am very glad the gentleman raised that point because, in my judgment, and in accordance with what we heard in the way of expert testimony from the officials, the restoration of this reenlistment item would be prejudicial to the service for the very reason stated by the gentleman from Kentucky—that there is already a surplus in these upper grades.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman has referred to the Coast Guard Academy graduating more men than are needed. The graduates of the Coast Guard Academy are not affected by this provision; they become officers.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. I was in error as to the Coast Guard. The statement was made that there was a surplus in the upper grades. It would be poor economy to put more men in grades where they are not needed.

Mr. LUDLOW. And, another thing, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from New York spoke as if this were hardly keeping faith with the enlistees in these various services. This inhibition against the gratuity has been in effect since July 6, 1933. Certainly every person who enlisted since that time did so with his eyes open and knew that he would not get this gratuity. So it cannot be said there is any bad faith on the part of the Government as far as those enlistees are concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The men enlisted in this period under the theory that this was a purely temporary thing, but now it has gone on for almost 4 years. We have restored allowances in all other branches. They had the right to feel it would be restored to the enlisted men of the Coast Guard.

Mr. LUDLOW. Let me ask the gentleman on what basis they could suppose it was a temporary thing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because when the original proviso was passed in 1933 it was announced as being temporary.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further statement?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. There is no difficulty now in securing reenlistments. A great many men prefer not to reenlist because they can find more lucrative employment in private industry. I see no reason why we should encourage men to reenlist at the expense of the Government to the extent of $412,000 a year.

Mr. LUDLOW. In this one service.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. In this one service, where the men themselves are not desirous of coming back because they can secure employment in private industry.

Mr. LUDLOW. It seems to me this is a time when we should consider the country's taxpayers. Of course, I want the Government to keep faith with everybody, but I cannot see even a semblance of bad faith in this proviso.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the reason I am opposed to this particular provision is not to cut out enlistment bonuses offered to induce people to stay in the service but merely as a restoration to them of what they have always considered a part of their regular pay. When they reenlist they expect this. I understand they get from $21 to $35 a month. This is the only branch of the service to which any part of the old economy act continues to apply.

Mr. LUDLOW. I still do not understand why the gentleman feels they should consider this as part of their compensation, especially since this provision has been in effect since 1933.

Mr. SCOTT. If it is the intention of Congress to take this reenlistment bonus away from them permanently, why do we not amend the law itself, instead of carrying a paragraph in an appropriation bill each year? Why not do it right by amending the law itself?

Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order that the provision is not germane to the subject matter of the appropriation bill. This bill appropriates money for the Treasury and Post Office Departments. It includes a provision restricting appropriations for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and, because it relates to other branches than those covered by the bill, it has no place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREENWOOD). The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

The point of order is made against this proviso appearing on page 27, at line 10:

Provided further, That section 18 of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1934, is hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for the purpose of making such section applicable to such latter fiscal year the figures "1934" shall be read as "1938."

This section clearly continues a provision of the so-called Economy Act of the Seventy-third Congress enacted in 1933, which eliminated bonus payments for reenlistment in certain departments of the Government. This provision expired by operation of law. This section provides for its reenactment or its continuance, and is, therefore, legislation. The suggestion has been made that the point of order should be overruled because there is a retrenchment under the Holman rule.

The Chair reads from Cannon's Precedents, volume 7, section 1538:

Unless an amendment proposes legislation which will retrench an expenditure with definite certainty, it is not in order under the Holman rule.

And, again, section 1542 of the same volume, which is a little more clearly applicable to this particular point of order:

In construing the Holman rule the Chair may not speculate or surmise as to whether a particular provision might or might not operate to retrench an expenditure. Legislation proposed on an appropriation bill must indicate by its terms an unqualified reduction of expenditure to fall within the exception of the rule.

The Chair is of the opinion that the showing made is not definite enough to be an unqualified reduction of expenditure, because it is entirely speculative as to whether there would be reenlistments. The Chair, therefore, does not believe the proviso comes within the provisions of the Holman rule. It is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, certainly as a matter of fact there would be a reduction. May I ask, if it were established to the satisfaction of the Chair that there would be a reduction in any amount, even though the amount is indefinite, the Chair would then hold the Holman rule would not apply?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has to be certain there would be a reduction of the compensation paid out of the Treasury, and that could only be based upon the assumption that there would be no reenlistments. That is not sufficiently certain for the Chair to say that there would be a definite amount saved; therefore, the Chair thinks the Holman rule would not apply. It is clearly legislation upon an appropriation bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the bill down to and including line 7, page 50.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BOLAND] having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4720, the Treasury-Post Office Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

TEACHING OR ADVOCATING COMMUNISM IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair appoints the following conferees: Mrs. NORTON, Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, and Mr. SHORT.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HILL of Oklahoma for 1 week on account of business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the remarks I made in Committee today I may be permitted to set out some figures in the form of a table instead of running them in paragraphs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon in Committee and insert therein certain tables prepared by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon and to include therein certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

(Mr. RANDOLPH asked and was granted leave to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a bill which I introduced today pertaining to old-age pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 19, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

409. By Mr. TEIGAN: Memorial of the Minnesota House of Representatives, urging Congress to give the Townsend recovery plan careful and serious consideration; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

410. By Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey: Resolution of the mayor and Common Council of the Borough of Ogdensburg, N. J., protesting the President's proposed reorganization of the Supreme Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

411. By Mr. TOBEY: Memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, opposing passage of bill providing for changes in the Supreme Court as outlined in the recent message of the Executive; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

412. By Mr. WIGGLESWORTH: Petition of the Bar Association of the City of Boston, urging the Congress of the United States to reject the proposals contained in the President's message of February 5, 1937, and in the bill accompanying it insofar as they relate to the Supreme Court of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Heavenly Father, who understandest all Thy children, and through whose gift of faith we bring our perplexities to the light of Thy wisdom: Grant us the vision of the great emprise which Thou, through us, hast purposed for our country, and make us conscious of such high intent that we may ever use those meeker things which make up half the nobleness of life—words of good cheer and a glance of friendly eyes, by which we pluck delight from the dusty wayside of earth's strife as we give some morsel to a starving heart and teach it to behold some glimpse of Thee. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, who, in His hour of crying need, bore witness to the truth that man doth not live by bread alone but by every word that cometh from the mouth of God. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, February 17, 1937, when, on request of Mr. ROBINSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on February 11, 1937, the President approved and signed the bill (S. 1439) to provide for loans made necessary by floods or other catastrophes in the year 1937.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. FITZPATRICK, Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, and Mr. DIRKSEN were appointed managers on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mrs. NORTON, Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, and Mr. SHORT were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. STEIWER conferees on the part of the Senate.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS BY SENATOR COPELAND

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement in the nature of a petition in my own behalf.

I have received about 30,000 letters and telegrams relative to the Supreme Court. My office is swamped with them. I have had to employ extra help to open the envelopes. I should like to take this method of announcing to my constituents that I have received these letters and telegrams. It would bankrupt me certainly, and perhaps the Government, if I were to attempt to make reply to all of them, although many of them ask for an immediate reply.

Mr. President, of course I am happy to hear from those constituents, but I am anxious likewise to have some of the mail from other constituents, relating to other subjects, brought to my attention. It is so submerged in the letters relating to the Supreme Court that my office is quite disorganized; in spite of its able personnel, it is almost unable to cope with the flood of mail.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I petition, through you, sir, my constituents to please give us some relief. I feel that I am fully informed now of their views, and, of course, shall not forget their wishes, ever bearing them in mind.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN SENATE RECORDS TO NATIONAL ARCHIVES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Archivist, relative to the transfer of certain records and papers from the files of the Senate to The National Archives Building, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC WORKS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Assistant Administrator of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to continue the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for 2 years, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution of the senate and the house of representatives memorializing the Congress of the United States to give favorable consideration to the retention of United States experiment stations in Oklahoma and other Middle Western States

Whereas we are advised that the National Budget for the fiscal year 1938, as presented to the Congress of the United States, contains the following statement: "A reduction of $40,578 for dry-land agriculture is estimated"; and

Whereas in order to meet this reduction it is proposed to discontinue entirely the work now being conducted by the Division of Dry Land Agriculture at eight experiment stations located in Oklahoma and other Middle Western States; and

Whereas a survey of these experiment stations shows that they have authentic information on weather, crops, soils, tillage, plants, insects, and diseases which is valuable to the farmers of the State of Oklahoma; and

Whereas the information supplied by these stations are at the ready command of farmers who may visit these stations in person or who may request this information by direct correspondence; and

Whereas these stations maintain a close contact and relationship with many other Federal and State agencies that are actively interested in farm problems, thereby resulting in a mutual advantage to the general interests of dry-land agriculture; and

Whereas the value of research obtained through the continuous operation of these experiment stations over a period of many years has been of great value; and

Whereas a committee appointed by the President to make a study of the Great Plains region of the United States made a specific recommendation in their report that the regular annual appropriation for the Division of Dry Land Agriculture be increased to $250,000, we see no logical reason for the proposed reduction of $40,578 to the Division of Dry Land Agriculture: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Oklahoma, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized and respectfully urged to give favorable consideration to the retention of the various experiment stations in the middle western part of the United States, and the clerk of the senate is hereby directed to send an enrolled copy of this resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of the United States, and to each member of the Oklahoma delegation in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolution memorializing Congress to give the so-called Townsend recovery plan, otherwise known as the General Welfare Act of 1937, careful and serious consideration

Whereas among the greatest problems before our country as a whole at this time are unemployment and care of the aged; and

Whereas the United States Government is seeking ways and means to restore prosperity in our country; and

Whereas many thousands of our citizens in Minnesota and throughout the Nation have indicated that they believe that the Townsend plan, if adopted, will provide an adequate plan of recovery and greatly benefit all our people: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urgently petitioned to give the so-called Townsend recovery plan, otherwise known as the General Welfare Act of 1937, careful and serious consideration; be it further

Resolved, That the Minnesota Members of the United States Senate and the Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota be, and they are hereby, petitioned and most earnestly urged to use their best efforts to bring about careful and serious consideration of the said plan; be it further

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be presented to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to include in the social security legislation provisions that will secure old-age benefits to people engaged in farming

Whereas South Carolina is primarily an agricultural State and a great portion of its citizenry is engaged in farming; and

Whereas the United States of America, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, has provided for old-age benefits to accrue to persons engaged in various businesses; and

Whereas no provision has been made to secure old-age benefits to people engaged in farming: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, requested to include persons engaged in farming as beneficiaries under the old-age benefit provisions of the social security legislation; be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives and the Clerk of the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Senate Joint Memorial 2

To His Excellency the Honorable President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition as follows:

Whereas certain species of fish, Sardinops Caerulea, popularly known as pilchard or sardine, is found in abundance along and off the entire Pacific coast of the United States and Vancouver Island; and

Whereas said species of fish is apparently of migratory character, being found along and off said entire Pacific coast; and

Whereas it is desirable that adequate information and knowledge be had concerning the habitat, the abundance, and wise use of said fish; and

Whereas no one State or sovereignty should be considered as having any vested exclusive right to or interest in the resource, and an adequate survey cannot be carried on by one State alone; and

Whereas such scientific findings may form the basis for sound governmental control and conservation, which is desired: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That we do most earnestly petition and memorialize the Honorable President of the United States and Congress to take action and pass adequate legislation to provide:

1. For negotiation of a treaty with the Dominion of Canada looking toward joint and equitable supervision of said fishery.

2. For immediate scientific investigation and survey of said resource under the direction of the Federal Bureau of Fisheries in coordination with the fisheries departments of the States of Oregon, Washington, and California.

3. For the appropriation by Congress of sufficient funds to carry on such investigation and survey, a part of which shall be equitably allocated to said fisheries departments of said States of Oregon, Washington, and California for their part in such work; be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the Senate of the State of Oregon be authorized and directed to forward without delay a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress of the United States from the States of Oregon, Washington, and California.

Senate Joint Memorial 4

Whereas it appears that there is an attempt to secure a ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention; and

Whereas any attempt to raise the embargo on animal products from Argentina, or any province thereof, would subject the livestock and game of the United States to a constant menace of foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas past experience shows that foot-and-mouth disease has caused millions of dollars' damage and depletion of livestock and game and has caused great economic loss: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, respectfully petition the Senate of the United States to refrain from the ratification of the Argentine Sanitary Convention and urge that the present embargo against every country where the foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist be maintained in order that there shall be no experimentation at the expense of the health and safety of our livestock and wild animals; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress of the United States and to each Member thereof from this State, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to each house of the legislative assembly of those States whose legislatures now are in session.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire, protesting against the enactment of legislation that might affect the independence of the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. BRIDGES.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to enlarge the activities of the C. C. C. camps

Whereas large agricultural districts in the State of South Dakota have become infested with obnoxious and destructive weeds, particularly creeping Jennie and leafy spurge; and

Whereas the drought and crop failures prevailing in the same districts has made it impossible for the farmers to adequately clean their farms and fields and to eradicate the spread of said weeds; and

Whereas the value of the farms is being destroyed as a result thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the senate concurring), That we respectfully urge Congress to amend the Federal statutes and enlarge the activities of the C. C C. camps so that the services of the members thereof may be employed in assisting in the destruction and eradication of such obnoxious weeds on both the public and private lands within the State of South Dakota; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to transmit copies of these resolutions to the presiding officers of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, and to the several members of the South Dakota delegation in Congress, and to the Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the New York branch of the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors, favoring an increase in the appropriation, and also an extension of time, for the Federal Trade Commission to complete its investigation into the marketing of perishable farm commodities, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate the memorial of the Keokuk (Iowa) Trades and Labor Assembly, remonstrating against the confirmation of the appointment of George J. Keller as Iowa State administrator of the Works Progress Administration, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Local No. 301, United Electrical and Radio Workers of America, of Schenectady, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation for the benefit of unemployed youth, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate the memorial of William H. Schifelbein, of Milwaukee, Wis., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation tending to abridge the rights of freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of Chelsea, Mass., favoring donation to that city of the marine hospital land and building for park or recreational purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of Edward J. Crowley, of Lead City, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the issuance of renewable contracts to qualified star-route contractors and subcontractors, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Citizens Forum of Columbia Heights, Washington, D. C., favoring the repeal of legislation relating to the teaching or advocating of communism in the public schools in the city of Washington, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Central Committee of the Non-Partisan Party of Hawaii, favoring the establishment of a branch of the National Labor Relations Board in Hawaii and also the appointment of a Federal Labor Commissioner for that Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of Chicopee, Mass., requesting the construction of new dikes for flood protection along the Connecticut River, including that portion of the Chicopee River at its confluence with the Connecticut River which would be subjected to backflow during flood periods, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Butler County Teachers Association, of Augusta, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation to assist the States and Territories in providing more effective programs of public education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a resolution adopted by the Rotary Club of Flint, Mich., protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation that might affect the independence of the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRIDGES. I present a resolution adopted by the New Hampshire Legislature relative to the proposed change in the judiciary system, and ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD and will also be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the form of government under which the United States has prospered for a century and a half, and under which the liberties of the American people have been guaranteed by the independence of the judiciary branch of the Government, is now threatened by bills pending in the National Congress; and

Whereas it is of vital concern to all citizens of the United States to preserve and protect the independence of the courts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire as the guardian of the interests of our people, That this house is opposed to the passage of the aforesaid bills; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

Mr. BACHMAN presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 14

Whereas the great loss of human life and the property damage resulting to the people of Tennessee living in the Cumberland River Valley and on its tributaries and in the Mississippi Valley from the ravages of the recent floods in those streams have been so great as to shock the people of the entire Nation; and

Whereas the people living in the Tennessee River Valley and on its tributaries have suffered no loss of life and practically no financial loss on account of the said flood, the rainfall being as great over the Tennessee River Valley as over the valley of the Cumberland River and other parts of Tennessee; and

Whereas the developments made on the Tennessee River and its tributaries by the Tennessee Valley Authority were the sole protection of citizens and property within the Tennessee River Valley and its tributaries, thus furnishing a striking example of the efficiency of the great program of President Roosevelt to improve the navigation of these interstate streams, protect the soil from erosion, and encourage reforestation, and insure agricultural rehabilitation and power development for the benefit of the people of the territory affected, and, indirectly, for the benefit of the people of the Nation as a whole, thus vindicating the wisdom of President Roosevelt and the Congress in establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority; and

Whereas it is now manifest to every intelligent person that the Cumberland River should be developed along the same lines as the Tennessee River projects are being developed, and that this development is a pressing and urgent need of the people of the State of Tennessee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Tennessee (the house concurring, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee to proceed at the earliest practical moment to enact legislation along the lines of the Logan bill which passed the United States Senate over a year ago, that the Cumberland River and its tributaries, and territory adjacent thereto, be attached to and become a part of the Tennessee Valley Authority and that the Congress appropriate an amount sufficient to make the necessary improvements on said stream; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the senate transmit to the Vice President of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Senators MCKELLAR and BACHMAN, and to each of the Congressmen from the State of Tennessee, copies of this resolution.

FORM PROTESTS AGAINST JUDICIARY REORGANIZATION PLAN

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a number of printed protests against the appointment of additional Judges to the Supreme Court. The first is a printed postal card which has only the name of the writer and is manifestly propaganda. The second is a printed pink slip marked at the top "Hands off the Supreme Court", and everything is arranged except the signature. The next is a green slip of the same character; and the fourth is a more extended propaganda document headed "Only They Deserve Liberty Who Are Willing to Fight for It."

Fifth, I send to the clerk's desk a printed letter sent out by John E. Edgerton, of Lebanon, Tenn., president of Southern States Industrial Council, Inc., a piece of political propaganda that is unique. The President's proposal on the Court question is termed "Democracy's Last Trench", is severely denounced, and the members of the council are urged to write letters to Members of Congress. This is not only political propaganda but it is vicious partisan propaganda. I ask, Mr. President, that the entire letter, including headings, be printed in the RECORD, and that the several form protests to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD just as they have come to me and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the protests and letter were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., February 16, 1937.

Senator MCKELLAR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I earnestly advocate that you use your influence to prevent passage of any legislation permitting the appointment of additional Justices to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Yours truly,

BRIAN CALDWELL.

Voting address: Memphis, Tenn.

HANDS OFF THE SUPREME COURT!

DEAR SIR: Believing that the proposal to revise and weaken the United States Supreme Court would prepare the way for dictatorship in our country, I earnestly urge you to use your influence against the measure.

Mrs. J. C. BOY.

HANDS OFF THE SUPREME COURT!

DEAR SIR: Believing that the proposal to revise and weaken the United States Supreme Court would prepare the way for dictatorship in our country, I earnestly urge you to use your influence against the measure.

C. F. KING.

ONLY THEY DESERVE LIBERTY WHO ARE WILLING TO FIGHT FOR IT

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, exercising our right of petition, protest against the President's bill or any substitutes permitting the executive branch of the Government to control or subordinate the judicial or the legislative powers established under the Constitution.

This bill would give to the President the power to remake the Supreme Court and to pack it with men to interpret the Constitution as he wishes. Such concentration of power is dangerous even in the hands of the best-intentioned man.

The framers of the Constitution divided the Government into independent legislative, executive, and judicial departments, because history shows that concentration of those powers in one department, or in one man, inevitably leads to dictatorship.

This bill would establish such concentration of power as no one at any time in any place has been able to use for the public good. The independent branches of the Government would become the instruments of the White House. Public respect for the courts and the Congress, so essential in a democracy, would be seriously impaired.

If one President is allowed in this fashion to create a Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution so as to validate the laws he desires, neither he nor his successors will have to consult the will of the people concerning future amendments.

We, therefore, protest and demand that the constitutional safeguards of an independent judiciary be retained.

The power to amend our Constitution is not the Executive's to exercise by indirection. It is not yours to surrender. It is ours, and we look to you, trustees of the people's liberties, to protect it. How you vote on this issue is all-important, now and in the future.

DEMOCRACY'S LAST TRENCH

To the Industrialists of the South:

This is not a song of hate. It is not just another word of warning. It is intended to be the loudest alarm we have ever sounded.

I believe that every calm, thoughtful citizen in these United States, whether he be Democrat or Republican, New Dealer or anti-New Dealer, is or will be shocked as he has never been before by what appears to be a proposal to cudgel our present Supreme Court into servile acquiescence or innocuous retirement. No such mandate has been given to anybody. No matter how sympathetic he may be with the general policies of the present administration, or with its high objectives, no Member of the United States Congress who has his country's welfare at heart will look at this revolutionary proposal from a partisan political viewpoint. It involves, in my opinion, the very life of the Republic and of our democratic ideals.

The Nation remembers well that recovery did not actually begin in this country until the Supreme Court invalidated, by unanimous decision, the N. R. A. That and other memorable decisions stimulated the confidence of the people that in our Federal courts the country has a nonpolitical and dependable defender of their rights and liberties against any ambitious encroachments of either of the other two coordinate branches of our Government. Whatever hasty, ill-considered legislation might be passed by a submissive Congress there stood ready the greatest court on earth to protect justice and the people's rights. That is what gave the people the most of their confidence, for they realized that the judicial branch of Government was the only one of the three that was functioning normally and independently of political compulsion. When our courts, therefore, are curbed or handicapped in the free exercise of their fundamental powers, or when they become invaded at any point by fear of political or social reprisal, the last great bulwark of our liberties against the tyrannies of popular passion will be gone.

Even in their demonstrated loyalties to the political traditions of their section, the people of the Southern States are calling upon all of their representatives in the United States Congress to divest their minds and hearts of whatever partisan bias or passion they may have and stand like good American soldiers and save our courts from all impassioned efforts to destroy their independence. For never was the spirit of lawlessness so manifestly rampant in our Nation as at this hour. Witness the audacious defiance at Detroit and other places of not only the courts but of all public authority. This universally condemned spectacle of outlawry is typical of those forces that despise courts and orderly government. Out of these forces came the first clamor for vengeance against judicial authority, and its chorus has increased with every decision that was displeasing to them. Even if judicial reform is desirable at any point, this is the poorest time in the world to give what will be interpreted as aid and comfort to the enemies of law and of our country. The people beseech you, gentlemen, to think clearly, independently, and for a long time before you vote at all, and then vote to do nothing that will weaken our judicial system in any degree or bring it into disrepute or humiliation.

No man who believes in America, in American principles, ideals, and institutions, can view with complacency a proposal which will virtually establish beyond question a dictatorship in our country. When our Supreme Court is sterilized, or neutralized, the very last obstruction to a dictatorship will be gone. There have been, therefore, few moments in our Nation's history as serious as this one. The next few weeks will tell the story. Unless the people arouse and bestir themselves as they never have before democracy's last trench will be taken. The only influence with Congress that can match that of the President's is that of the people. Every citizen who does not believe that the time has arrived for a dictatorship in our Nation should wire both his Congressman and his two Senators protesting in the most respectfully vigorous language possible against any tampering with the Supreme Court of the United States.

This is no time for timidity or cowardice. It is no time for pussyfooting. Those who are in their hearts opposed to the subjugation of our Supreme Court should speak out in no uncertain terms, and speak quickly. I beseech every recipient of this letter to weigh carefully, and without bias of any sort, its contents and its suggestion. If you agree, then please act promptly and get as many others to act in similar manner as possible.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN E. EDGERTON, President.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1120) authorizing an appropriation for the erection of a memorial to the officers and men of the United States Navy who lost their lives as the result of a boiler explosion that totally destroyed the U. S. S. Tulip near St. Inigoes Bay, Md., on November 11, 1864, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 106) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1313. A bill for the relief of Lt. Comdr. Chester B. Peake, Supply Corps, United States Navy (Rept. No. 107); and

S. 1485. A bill to prohibit the making of photographs, sketches, or maps of vital military and naval defensive installations and equipment, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 108).

Mr. GILLETTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 824) for the relief of James Luker, Sr., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 109) thereon.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE TREATIES WITH DEBTOR NATIONS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution and ask to have it read, and then ask permission to submit a few remarks in support of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 83), as follows:

Whereas the present policy of the United States in international economics is for recoprical treaties of trade between nations; and

Whereas there exist undischarged and unadjusted debts due to the United States from nations of the world in all exceeding $12,000,000,000, and with interest and premiums due approaching $25,000,000,000; and

Whereas European nations indebted in the largest of sums refuse to pay the debt or any portion of it, refuse to pay the interest or any portion of it, and in many instances repudiate the debt and deny the obligation, in other instances refuse to submit any suggestion of adjustment, liquidation or compromise: Therefore be it

Resolved, That no reciprocal-trade treaty should be made between the United States of America and any nation which, being a debtor to the United States, refuses to pay the debt or to adjust the same, or which repudiates the debt due the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, with the grace of the Senate, I beseech its courtesy to allow me the privilege of making definite the reasons for the proposals embodied in my resolution.

Mr. President, the public press which comes to us from London announces that the distinguished visitor who lately was in our midst, Sir William Runciman, stated to his people upon his return, after conference with the officials of America here at Washington, that he had not obtained all that he desired in the requests which were made, and that he stated frankly that "some of them he would not be able yet to obtain." I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the distinguished gentleman said it was his desire, if possible, to secure arrangements with America in the form of trade relations that would prevent the United States from forbidding the furnishing to England in any form of supplies that would be necessary should she become involved in a war in which our sympathies were interested or our national interests were in common.

At the same time I beseech the Senate to recall that in this week the distinguished government for which that eminent statesman stood renewed its protective-tariff treaties with favor to the countries of Asia and three of Europe, leaving only as specially named what is known as the Ottawa agreement granting preferences and privileges to Canada. The United States, for reasons satisfactory to that great government, is particularly excluded from these trade favors advanced. At the same time, Mr. President, we note that the English Government finds it agreeable to enter into an agreement with Germany by which the balances of exchange in matters of finance give to Germany advantages. These at the same time are directly arranged and so conducted as to be to the disadvantage of this our United States. Of that we make no complaint. These nations have a right to protect themselves in such manner as they feel to their advantage.

In the meantime, Mr. President, France suggests to this Government a trade treaty called a reciprocal-trade treaty. The suggestion is made, as I understand, by the distinguished visitor who is here with us as the new Ambassador of France, whose presence is most welcome, and who, we hope, will find his official errand in this community quite agreeable from the point of social and personal relation. But the proposed treaty, as I behold it, runs counter to the principal productions of five of our great States of the United States. At the same time the great Government of France negotiates an agreement, partly with England and partly with other sources, to obtain hundreds of millions of dollars which are to be advanced to Poland. This is to pay the expenses of Poland for an increased army and further armament, to enable Poland—I use the language of quotation—"to meet any offense or defense necessary for its protection or the protection of its friends"—the latter meaning France—in anticipated conflict as to herself and Germany, or perchance Germany and Russia.

Mr. President, in the same season we behold that Italy enters into an understanding of trade and finance specifically with Germany. This special undertaking provides increased armament for both countries and provides for an issue now of bonds to be floated in this our America as the source of the eternal supply and the eternal spring of charity and financial favor, with the generosity of American money. These, sir, are all submitted at this time. While our United States has as the policy of our Government to enter into treaties with these nations which pretend to give some reciprocation, yet on their face as I behold them, in view of the results, they do not reciprocate to us, but involve wholly contribution from us.

Mr. President, today England announces the expenditure of $1,000,000,000 for a new form of armament and an increased form of offense or defense from a military point of view, and, as stated this morning, all in addition to what was lately pronounced as essential to her protection.

Now, Mr. President, regarding all of these matters, sir, we do not offer one word as to the purely domestic policy of any country. We may deplore, as deplore we ever do, that any land should expend such vast millions in armament and preparation for war, the beginning of which means, sooner or later, sir, threatening with destruction everything in civilization; but I say, sir, in all of this, that in none of these countries, with their vast expenditures, the sums they may expend or those which they are borrowing, is there the slightest pretense of meeting the obligation they have to the United States of America, either to pay a dollar of the indebtedness that is due us or to hold a conference by which the indebtedness may either be adjusted or in any form whatever liquidated. To the contrary, I cannot overlook the fact that within the past few days there has come from official sources, addressed to this honorable Government, the statement that these countries cannot send and never have intended to send anybody to our midst to take up the debt question; and the distinguished gentlemen who are with us as the representatives of these lands disclaim that they are authorized to touch this question in any form whatever.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator spoke of Mr. Runciman, who came over to visit us on the business he has suggested. The New York Herald Tribune of January 26, 1937, carried the following item relative to Mr. Runciman's visit:

> One situation not discussed today was that of the war debts. Mr. Runciman was asked if he found anyone brave enough to bring up this subject. "I haven't met that bold person yet", he said.

Mr. LEWIS. To which he added, "If it ever should come up, God forbid!"

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Illinois has repeatedly brought this subject before the Senate during the past 2 or 3 years. I wish to say to him and to the country that, in my opinion, there is now in progress a reversal of sentiment, so that there is a strong likelihood that within the next year something substantial may be accomplished looking toward the final settlement of the war debts. I believe that there is in some of the debtor countries a public opinion just beginning to grow which recognizes the unavoidability, the absolute necessity of sustaining their reputations by declining to commit themselves permanently to a policy of repudiation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. At this moment I express my thanks to the Senator from Arkansas for his observation. It is pertinent and very appropriate.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas if, in his opinion, the movement of which he speaks involves the reduction of the debts now owed the United States?

Mr. ROBINSON. No proposal has been submitted. No plan has been formulated. The only point in my statement is that, in my judgment, there is now in some of the important debtor countries the beginning of a movement which will build up a public opinion which will make it possible to work out some plan of final settlement.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not speak for any public authority other than myself. It is my information that that public opinion is beginning to grow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we may judge of the public opinion in the several countries by the press and by the statements of public men from those countries, there is undoubtedly on foot a movement to secure a reconsideration and a readjustment of the debts; but the entire program, so far as anything is concerned that I have been able to see or hear, is based upon the proposal of a reduction of the present debt; another contract, but no payment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Idaho, I should like to say that

I do not think it would be possible at this time to forecast what may be accomplished. I should not like to say that I should be unwilling to agree to any form of reduction of the debts, nor should I like to say that it would be essential to advance a proposal for their reduction. My point is that in all likelihood within the next few months there will be demonstrated in this country a sentiment strongly in favor of collection, and in some of the debtor countries the necessity for payment will be recognized because of the growth of public opinion in those countries in favor of sustaining the national honor and declining to sustain repudiation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield further to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. There is no doubt that some of these countries would like to maintain their national honor; but I have yet to see the first paragraph in any foreign newspaper, or the first statement by any foreign public man, indicating that they have any intention of paying the debt as it now stands.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have encouraged these interpolations. They are filled with wisdom and are very suggestive of what we all hope, looking for some rescue, some refuge from the present financial impasse. I trust that the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of this side, and the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] indicate that there is on the way a settlement that will do some justice to the United States and enable us to escape the imputation indulged all over the world that, through either our cowardice or our ignorance, we are allowing ourselves to be continuously imposed on.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for the moment to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should like to add to this symposium that I hope none of these foreign countries is misled into believing that by making a few small token payments upon these obligations it can reestablish a credit that can be extended once more into a fabulous borrowing, because, in my judgment, that is not going to be consented to again.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the observation of the Senator from Michigan is very pertinent. We know what is afloat in the atmosphere, and I recall that it fulfills the definition of Jonson in his definition of gratitude—that "it is a lively sense of favors yet to come." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, on this point I will add that, while I join in the suspicion toward the declaration on the part of those who hope to borrow upon the small earnest payment to which my distinguished friend from Michigan alludes, I trust they will not be successful, for we have been deluded sufficiently to have learned some lesson by our experiences.

Therefore I come to the definite point of my resolution, that I may not disturb the Senate unnecessarily long. The Government of Argentina, beholding that we had passed some law, in the form, I believe, of a tariff bill, which forbids the cattle of Argentina entering the United States because of what we feel is some infection which would defile if not destroy our own, refuses now, in retaliation, to enter into any trade treaty with the United States of America. With this before us, I have the suggestion to make, if the hope of the able Senator from Arkansas and the inclination upon the part of the able Senator from Idaho may be fulfilled, a hope that is indulged by us all, that there will be a disposition that will do credit to the creditor as well as honor to the debtor. I suggest that one of the methods that will most completely advance it, and I believe speedily and with success, is that we announce that as to any nation which has treated us in the manner described as to its debt and continues to repudiate the debt while it holds us up to opprobrium before the world as a nation seeking to collect money that is not our property, and making a demand which takes the form of blackmail upon civilized nations, there shall be no further negotiation touching these trade treaties; that our country will refuse to enter into reciprocity or trade treaties with nations which, obtaining all benefits under such treaties, afford us not only no benefit but disadvantage, great indebtedness, and, finally, a continuation of a policy toward us of little less than national robbery.

I propose in this resolution that we decline to negotiate trade treaties with the countries which have treated us in this manner, and which continue to do so. I go further and suggest that we continue the policy as to all of these countries regarding these trade treaties so long as they continue their policy of repudiation and injustice to us in the matter of the debts.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, the Senator from Illinois wants more money and less acrimony? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. I want the money. As to the acrimony, I concur. I do not want the acrimony; but if the consonants can be changed, and the word be made "alimony", I will accept that. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. To be serious again, I noticed what the Senator from Illinois said about a certain country seeking to ship meat into this country.

Mr. LEWIS. I referred to Argentina.

Mr. COPELAND. We spent millions of dollars and destroyed millions of cattle in the United States in an effort to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease. I think it would be unpatriotic if we should enter into any arrangement with any country which would permit them to ship into the United States any substance which might mean reinfection of our cattle, or might harm in any sense the health of the people and of the animals of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from New York, as his contribution to any discussion is always informing.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I apologize for disturbing the Senator; but in reply to the statement made by the Senator from New York I may say that the matter to which he has referred has been thoroughly investigated by the State Department and by the Secretary of Agriculture, and there are now upon the statute books laws under which the Department of Agriculture has full and complete authority to prohibit the importation into the United States of any cattle or of any horticultural products which are diseased, or which threaten in any way to jeopardize the health of the people of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I realize that there are such laws, but if we were to have a treaty such as is proposed those laws would go into the discard. What I have said does not apply to every section of the Argentine, but if there were permission to ship meat products into the United States from certain sections of the Argentine it would be harmful not alone to the stock raisers and the farmers of the United States but certainly to the health of the herds of the entire country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will permit me one more word, I think the Senator from New York is entirely mistaken in assuming that any treaty would be negotiated which would abrogate the laws which now exist for the exclusion from the United States of any diseased cattle or, for that matter, any diseased vegetables or other products of the soil. I may say that any treaty or trade agreement would take cognizance of the situation, and all the authority now in the Department of Agriculture would be preserved, and the interests of the United States would be fully protected. We need have no apprehension as to the result of any treaty or trade agreement.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. CONNALLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, and then I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that no treaty would be negotiated which would impair the protection of the livestock industry of the United States. Of course, I am quite willing to admit that the authorities would not intentionally negotiate any such treaty; but, in my opinion, a treaty has been negotiated which, if put into effect, will have that very result. We hear talk about there being no foot-and-mouth disease in some particular portion of the Argentine. No one today knows where the disease may spread in Argentina from where it is now. It is a disease which spreads rapidly, and no method has ever been discovered by which to control its spread.

Mr. LEWIS. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois if some confusion has not arisen. There are two treaties. The Argentine sanitary treaty is the one dealing with the matter mentioned by the Senator from Idaho, which is altogether another matter from the reciprocal-trade agreement. It is against the so-called sanitary treaty that the Senator from Idaho is directing his observations.

I heartily concur with the Senator from Idaho, and I expect vigorously to oppose any ratification of the treaty with the Argentine which would make it even remotely possible to reintroduce into the United States the very dangerous and ofttimes fatal foot-and-mouth disease, which in 1914 was prevalent in 24 States of this Union, and which required the expenditure of not only millions of dollars but the killing of entire herds of cattle and the incineration of their bodies in order to stamp out the disease.

As stated by the Senator from Idaho, medical science has never discovered any remedy for this disease, and we do not propose to endanger all of the dairy herds in Wisconsin and the cattle in Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, and, incidentally, in Texas, and the great dairy herds in New York State, in order to get two bits' worth of trade, while endangering the whole cattle industry of the United States.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding to me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I appreciate the contribution of the Senator from Texas upon the matter of disease of cattle. I am not so well learned on that subject as are many Senators who have risen to speak on this phase. I recognize the necessity for legitimate protection of the United States, but what I fear is not that these nations will inject this cattle controversy, not that they will do something that converts us to cattle, but it is their treating us as asses that causes me serious concern. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have occupied much of the time of the Senate in discussing this resolution. I conclude by merely expressing the wish that these great nations shall apply to themselves the Christian principle to which in religion they are subscribed, "That which ye would have done for you, you do unto ourselves."

I thank the Senate for its indulgence.

I take it that the resolution in natural course would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will leave it to any other Senator to move a disposition of it if I am wrong in my judgment. Otherwise, I shall move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will permit the Chair to make a suggestion, resolutions of this character have generally gone to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no objection to the resolution's being referred to any appropriate committee. I myself was in doubt, and I take the opinion of the Chair on the subject. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to have the resolution referred to any committee he may desire.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the resolution should go to the Committee on Finance, because it is a matter which relates to legislation emanating from that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

INVESTIGATION OF VIOLATIONS OF FREE SPEECH AND ASSEMBLY—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to the order of reports of committees so that I may be permitted from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 70 [submitted by Mr. THOMAS of Utah (for himself and Mr. LA FOLLETTE) on the 27th ultimo] increasing the limit of expenditures of the Special Committee on Civil Liberties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, in line 6, after the word "by", to strike out "$50,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$40,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution 266, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, agreed to June 6, 1936, to investigate violations of the right of free speech and assembly and interference with the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively, is hereby increased by $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Chair will permit me, I should like to make a brief statement concerning the resolution which has just been agreed to? I merely wish to state, Mr. President, that in view of the depleted funds of the special committee I am not resisting the amendment recommended by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but the members of the special committee feel that the amount originally suggested is the barest minimum, and that it will probably be necessary for the committee to return, before the conclusion of the investigation, and ask for an additional appropriation in case the Senate wishes the inquiry continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to move reconsideration of the action by which the resolution was agreed to?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have already made the statement, Mr. President, that I have not resisted the amendment for the simple reason that the special committee will have to conclude its hearings today and could not proceed without the money provided in the resolution.

CONFERENCE ON FLOOD RELIEF

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on the 16th of the present month there was a conference held in the office of Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, W. P. A. Administrator, with a number of mayors and representatives of mayors from the Ohio Valley in the flood region, with respect to what could be done by the various Government agencies dealing with flood relief. Certain questions were propounded in writing, to which Mr. Hopkins gave detailed answers. Those answers and questions together make up a very informative memorandum for the information of public officers and private individuals as to what can be done in the way of rehabilitation. I ask unanimous consent that the minutes of that conference in the form of a memorandum be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, February 17, 1937.

To participants in the conference which was held in the office of Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, on February 16, 1937, and attended by various persons representing the State of Kentucky and communities therein:

At Mr. Hopkins' direction, there is forwarded herewith a memorandum which summarizes the answers which were given during the conference to the list of questions which were propounded, covering the assistance that can be given by various agencies of the Federal Government in connection with meeting the flood situation in Kentucky.

F. C. HARRINGTON,
Assistant Administrator, Chief Engineer.

The names of the various persons representing the State of Kentucky and communities therein, who attended the conference held in the office of Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, Works Pregress Administrator, on February 16, 1937, are shown herewith: Hon. Alben W. Barkley, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Brent Spence, Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Andrew J. May, Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Emmet O'Neal, Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.; Hon. William V. Gregory, Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Fred M. Vinson, Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.; Hon. A. B. Chandler, Governor of Kentucky, Frankfort, Ky.; Dr. A. T. McCormack, State Commissioner of Public Health, Louisville, Ky.; Mr. Bob Humphreys, chairman, Kentucky Highway Commission, Mayfield, Ky.; Hon. Brady Stewart, county judge of McCracken County, Paducah, Ky.; Hon. Ben F. Ewing, county judge of Jefferson County, Louisville, Ky.; Mr. Laurence S. Graumann, county attorney of Jefferson County, Louisville, Ky.; Hon. Joe Hermann, mayor of Newport, Newport, Ky.; Hon. Henry Knollman, mayor of Covington, Covington, Ky.; Hon. Olin Davis, mayor of Dayton, Dayton, Ky.; Hon. William C. Simpson, mayor of Ashland, Ashland, Ky.; Hon. Hugh Chatfield, mayor of Catlettsburg, Catlettsburg, Ky.; Mr. John Rawlings, city manager, Newport, Ky.; Mr. Henry Newmann, city commissioner, Covington, Ky.; Mr. Urey Woodson, alien property custodian, Owensboro, Ky.; Mr. C. J. Neekamp, chairman, flood control committee, post office box 569, Ashland, Ky.; Mr. Forest J. Alvin, president, chamber of commerce, Covington, Ky.; Mr. Tom Waller, Paducah, Ky.; Major Lebkuecher, aide to the Governor, Frankfort, Ky.; Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator Works Progress Administration, Washington, D. C.; Lt. Col. F. C. Harrington, Assistant Administrator and Chief Engineer, Works Progress Administration, Washington, D. C.

MEMORANDUM

FEBRUARY 17, 1937.

At the conference in the office of Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, on February 16, 1937, a list of questions relating to the Federal agencies from which assistance may be drawn in the rehabilitation made necessary by the recent floods was the subject of discussion. There follows this list of questions, beneath each of which is given a summary of the answer as developed during the discussion.

It should be noted that the answers regarding assistance for individuals are given with specific reference to people to whom ordinary sources of credit are not available. As used hereafter "loan" refers to an advance of funds for which the borrower makes a promise to repay, whereas "grant" refers to money advanced without promise to repay. In this connection all advances made by the Red Cross are grants.

THE FARMER

1. How can he secure food for his stock?

Loans for feed for stock can be obtained from the Farm Credit Administration, which, however, takes a first lien on the stock. Loans can also be obtained from the Disaster Loan Corporation or the Resettlement Administration. The Resettlement Administration can also make a grant, which may or may not be in connection with a loan, for feed for stock owned by properly qualified persons. Under certain circumstances the Red Cross also will make grants for such feed.

2. How can he secure food for himself and his family?

Grants for food can be obtained from the Red Cross by farmers and their families who are in need. Loans or grants for such purposes can also be had from the Resettlement Administration.

3. How can he secure farming implements destroyed by the flood?

The Resettlement Administration is prepared to make loans or grants, where necessary, for farm implements.

4. How can he secure furnishings for his house?

The Red Cross is prepared to replace furniture for individuals who have no other means of replacing it. The Resettlement Administration could make loans for this purpose.

5. How can he secure the livestock necessary for farming which have been destroyed?

Loans or grants from the Resettlement Administration can be obtained for this purpose.

6. In what manner can he secure aid to repair his home, barns, and buildings?

Should no credit be available, the Red Cross can make a grant for materials and repair work. The Resettlement Administration can make grants, or loans and grants, for such purposes. In cases where mortgages on the property are held by the Farm Credit Administration, needed additional loans for the repair of the property can, and should, be obtained from that agency.

7. How can he secure the reconstruction of buildings destroyed?

The Resettlement Administration can make loans for replacing such buildings as houses or barns which have been destroyed, and modest replacements can be obtained through grants. Whether the replacement would be obtained through a loan or a grant would depend on the individual circumstances of the case. Modest replacements can also be obtained through Red Cross grants, where needed.

8. In the event it is deemed necessary that he should remove from the area, what can be done as to his resettlement?

The Resettlement Administration is authorized to resettle rural families on farms, and this authority is interpreted to include the resettlement of persons living in cities and towns whose previous background is primarily agricultural.

9. How can he secure temporary work during the period of emergency when he has no other means of livelihood?

The Works Progress Administration will provide work on local public projects for all people in need of work who can be spared from work on the farms. The employment will be available as long as it is necessary.

10. What projects will be set up for his benefit?

The local public projects undertaken by the Works Progress Administration preferably will be those identified with flood damage. However, they will also be any other types of new projects desired by the local governmental agencies, or will be the continuation of work on projects already in operation. In any case the projects must be on public property.

URBAN HOME OWNER

11. What provision is being made for cleaning and minor repairs?

The responsibility for cleaning up and making minor repairs is primarily that of the individual owner, who will be assisted by the Red Cross where necessary. Clean-up work can be undertaken by the Works Progress Administration on private property only where the public-health office certifies a public-health hazard exists.

12. What provision is being made for major repairs?

The Red Cross is prepared to make grants for repairs on homes where the individuals have no credit resources. Loans for the repair of property on which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation holds mortgages can, and should, be obtained from that agency. Where other credit is not available loans can be obtained from the Disaster Loan Corporation.

13. What provision is being made for rebuilding where a house is destroyed?

The same resources mentioned under the previous question are available. In connection with this question there was discussion as to the dividing line between loans to be made by the Disaster Loan Corporation and regular industrial loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was agreed that this is a matter that should be given further consideration and Mr. Hopkins will discuss it with the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A copy of the press release which was read in the meeting, issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, February 11, 1937, relative to the operation of the Disaster Loan Corporation is attached hereto.

14. Is there any policy as to resettlement in the event the area is uninhabitable?

See questions no. 8 and no. 21.

15. What provision is there for temporary work?

The Works Progress Administration is prepared to put to work on local public projects on public property all people who are in need of work.

16. What provision is there in the situation where there is an H. O. L. C. mortgage?

Loans for the repair of property on which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation holds mortgages can, and should, be obtained from that agency.

17. What provision is there where there is a mortgage other than an H. O. L. C. mortgage and in the situation where there is no mortgage?

The Disaster Loan Corporation is not prevented by the existence of a previous mortgage from making loans. Where small amounts are needed, grants as previously explained can be obtained from the Red Cross.

18. How can the home owner whose credit has been impaired or destroyed by the flood obtain the necessary money to rehabilitate himself, through your organization or any other Government agency?

The Works Progress Administration is prepared to give such a person a job where supply of funds through work relief is appropriate. A Red Cross grant or a loan from the Disaster Loan Corporation is available for such a person as previously explained.

19. If such home owner cannot qualify for a loan, to what extent, and how would you provide financial aid to him?

The Red Cross is prepared to provide grants in such cases.

20. Will these loans and conditions be accorded to urban and rural home owners alike?

Yes. However, certain agencies will specialize in handling loans. The Resettlement Administration and the Farm Credit Administration will operate primarily in rural areas, while the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Disaster Loan Corporation will be the leading agencies in urban areas.

21. How can one whose home has been destroyed in the flood procure a new home above flood crests?

No categorical answer could be given to this question at this time, as the problem of moving persons from areas subject to flood to more secure locations is one that requires further exploration. The moving of the home of an individual can be handled under the methods previously described, but the relocation of small towns or of portions of the residential sections of cities may require additional legislation.

22. What can Works Progress Administration labor do, and how long can they be employed?

Works Progress Administration labor can be employed on public projects as previously explained under questions 9, 10, and 15. The employment will be provided for as long a period as the need for it continues.

23. Is it possible to have the Works Progress Administration provide labor in the repairing and reconstruction of homes?

Works Progress Administration labor may not be used for the repair or reconstruction of private property. The agency which assumes responsibility for the repair or reconstruction of homes whose owners are without financial resources is the Red Cross. Such assistance is usually granted by having the Red Cross assume the cost of repairs up to a certain amount and permitting the individual to make his own arrangements as to having the work done.

24. How can one whose home is uninhabitable by reason of the flood, procure in money the damage he has sustained, so that the money may be available for the establishment of a new home above flood stage?

It should be clearly understood that neither the Government agencies nor the Red Cross undertake to indemnify individuals for losses sustained by reason of the flood. The purpose of the various forms of assistance which are rendered is to give the help which is necessary in order that the individual may reestablish himself.

25. Is there any present power to supplement any of the aforementioned loans by grants, and if not, would you suggest and be in favor of legislation for that purpose?

The cases in which loans can be supplemented by grants are quite thoroughly covered in the answers to the preceding questions. It is believed that the grants which can be made by the Resettlement Administration and the Red Cross, coupled with the liberal lending powers possessed by other agencies, make it possible to meet the situation without additional legislation.

SMALL BUSINESS

26. What can be done for stock replacement?

The Disaster Loan Corporation is prepared to make loans for the replacement of stock where other sources of credit are not available. Under appropriate circumstances the Red Cross could make a grant for the same purpose. In this connection many wholesalers are willing to extend credit for stock replacement to individuals whose previous credit is good.

27. What can be done as to repairs?

The same resources exist as those mentioned under question no. 26.

28. What can be done as to rebuilding?

The same resources exist as those mentioned under question no. 26.

29. What provision will be made as to character loans?

The law creating the Disaster Loan Corporation was clearly drawn so as to authorize and encourage so-called character loans. Collateral is not essential, although where collateral is available it will be required.

30. What is the interest rate?

Three percent on loans made under the Disaster Loan Corporation.

31. What can be done as to loans and terms of loans?

The character of the various types of loans which can be made is quite thoroughly covered in the answers to the preceding questions. The circumstances of each individual case will govern the terms of the loan to be made.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS

32. What is going to be your policy with reference to rehabilitating churches, schools, and hospitals in the flood area?

The Works Progress Administration cannot undertake work on property that is not owned by a governmental agency, but can do work on such buildings as public schools and public hospitals. Sponsors will be expected to make such contributions as they can, and the proportion of Federal funds provided by the Works Progress Administration will be decided upon the circumstances in each individual case.

The Disaster Loan Corporation can make loans for the rehabilitation of privately owned schools and hospitals and has authority to lend to churches. The Red Cross assumes responsibility for the rehabilitation of churches, lodge buildings, and similar privately owned structures which were used for housing flood refugees and damaged in the process.

Proposals for undertaking large building construction projects should preferably be presented to the Public Works Administration.

33. How can an advance be received by State, county, or municipal governmental units, which have already spent their anticipated income, and which, because of State constitutional limitations, cannot legally bind themselves to repay any money borrowed?

No comprehensive answer can be given to this question. Each individual case will have to be explored upon its merits. Legislation by the State of Kentucky may be necessary to meet the situation. It is believed that the number of such cases will be small.

34. How can any city, State, or municipal governmental unit receive materials which are necessary for the reconstruction or repairing of public buildings, streets, water systems, and sewers, which have been damaged or destroyed during the recent flood, and where no funds are in the governmental treasury to purchase said materials and where the governmental agency cannot obtain credit by reason of constitutional limitations?

The bulk of the work described in this question would be undertaken by the Works Progress Administration. Sponsors will be expected to contribute funds for the purchase of materials to the extent of their ability. Where necessary, due to the financial condition of the sponsor, the Works Progress Administration will make funds available for the purchase of materials. Experience with sponsors in the flood area indicates that in many instances they are able to make substantial contributions.

MISCELLANEOUS

36. In all these matters, what is to be your general policy with regard to liberality and expedition of procedure?

The general policy is to render all necessary assistance to communities and individuals with the least possible delay.

35 and 37. What local branches will there be of the various departments of the Government? To insure prompt action and intelligent handling, we recommend a local office be arranged to cover each flood area.

A pamphlet covering the sources of assistance to those in need in the flood area will be prepared under the direction of the State Works Progress administrator for Kentucky, Mr. George H. Goodman, Ninth and Broadway, Louisville.

Steps are being taken to provide that the services available from the various Federal agencies will be properly coordinated and so that duplication of effort will be avoided wherever possible. In establishing such offices as may be necessary, the agencies, such as the Red Cross and the Disaster Loan Corporation, will arrange to tie in closely with the various other agencies. Information which has been obtained from the various agencies regarding the local offices now existing or to be established for service to the flood area in Kentucky is given herewith.

DISASTER LOAN CORPORATION

Inquiries at present should be directed to Mr. J. Fort Abell or Mr. Ben Johnson, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Lincoln Bank Building, 421 West Market Street, Louisville, Ky.

It is expected that decision as to the establishment of temporary offices at Paducah or other locations will be made by Friday, February 19, 1937.

AMERICAN RED CROSS

Work in McCracken, Marshall, Calloway, Graves, Ballard, Carlisle, Hickman, and Fulton Counties is under the direction of Mr. George E. Myer, American Red Cross, Sterick Building, Memphis, Tenn.

Work in all of the other counties affected by the flood is under the direction of Mr. A. L. Schafer, American Red Cross, 321 West Broadway, Louisville, Ky.

It is expected that the counties specifically named above will shortly be taken over by the office at Louisville. Information regarding the locations of the local offices should be obtained from one of those mentioned here.

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Inquiries as to the location of the county agents under whose charge specific matters would be handled or inquiries for other information should be directed to Mr. Earl Mayhew, State director, 801 South Limestone Street, Lexington, Ky.

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. John F. Davis, State manager, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Kentucky Home Life Insurance Building, Louisville, Ky.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Ernest Rice, general agent, Farm Credit Administration, Louisville, Ky.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

State office: Mr. George H. Goodman, State administrator, Works Progress Administration, Ninth and Broadway, Louisville, Ky.

District offices covering the flood area are located at Madison, Ky.; Louisville, Ky.; Lexington, Ky.; Paintsville, Ky.

FEBRUARY 15, 1937.

Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, today made public the following announcement:

The directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have appointed C. B. Henderson and Emil Schram, members of their board, joint managers of the Disaster Loan Corporation, and a loan committee consisting of Ben Johnson, Morton Macartney, W. J. Johnson, B. C. Stafford, E. E. Pendleton, and James Cole, all members of the R. F. C. Washington staff.

Mr. Henderson, Mr. Schram, and members of this loan committee, will visit the flood areas, and will where deemed advisable set up local advisory committees to assist in making the loans.

It will be our purpose to cooperate with the Red Cross and the Works Progress Administration in assisting those who have suffered losses that they can ill afford to stand.

The Disaster Loan Corporation will have no hard and fast rules as to terms or security. The act prescribes that the Corporation is empowered to make such loans as may be determined to be necessary or appropriate because of floods or other catastrophes in the year 1937, and that the loans shall be upon such terms and conditions, and made in such manner, as the Corporation may prescribe.

We interpret this to mean that loans should be made in accordance with the ability of the borrower to repay, and secured where the applicant is able to give security. Where the applicant is not able to give security but has a good reputation for paying his debts, his application will be given favorable consideration if the amount applied for and the purpose of the loan appear appropriate. Security may consist of collateral, personal endorsements, chattel mortgages on plant, equipment, fixtures, implements, livestock, etc., or mortgages upon real estate.

The interest rate will be 3 percent per annum, with a waiver of interest for the first 4 months. The terms and conditions of the loan will be fixed as nearly as possible to meet the requirements of the applicant, but with a view to the loan being repaid within a reasonable time.

No part of this fund will be lent to borrowers who are able to get money through the normal channels, or who are able to give the kind of security upon which the R. F. C. lends through its Industrial Loan Division or the R. F. C. Mortgage Co.

No additional personnel will be needed to administer the disaster loans, except possibly a little in the flood regions, and we hope to borrow most of that from banks and industries in the territory.

TEACHING COMMUNISM IN THE DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 148) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BLACK. I move the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BLACK, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. WALSH, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

CROP INSURANCE (H. DOC. NO. 150)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

During the past 4 years the Government has assisted farmers in meeting emergencies of two different types. The first was the collapse of prices resulting from huge surpluses for which foreign markets had disappeared. The second was widespread failure of crops resulting from drought.

Government action helped both farmers and consumers. Meanwhile again it has been shown that neither producers nor consumers are benefited by wide fluctuations in either prices or supplies of farm products.

Convinced that the time has come to take permanent steps to protect farmers and consumers against disasters of both types, I appointed, on September 19 last, a committee of representatives of Federal agencies and requested this committee to prepare a report and recommendations for legislation providing a plan of "all-risk" crop insurance.

The committee has now completed its work, and I transmit to you its report, entitled "Report and Recommendations of the President's Committee on Crop Insurance." I have examined this report and I am convinced that the plan it outlines is practical, socially desirable, and worthy of your thoughtful consideration.

I believe that it provides an adequate basis for legislation which will make possible a program of crop insurance applying to wheat for the crop year 1938. I believe that legislation should authorize application of similar programs to other commodities when it is established that producers desire them and application of the plan to wheat has provided a backlog of experience in applying the principles of crop insurance.

Crop insurance and a system of storage reserves should operate so that surpluses in years of good weather might be carried over for use in years of unfavorable growing conditions. Crop insurance and a system of storage reserves would help to protect the income of individual farmers against the hazards of crop failure; it would help to protect consumers against shortages of food supplies and against extremes of prices; and, finally, it would assist in providing a more nearly even flow of farm supplies, thus stabilizing farm buying power and contributing to the security of business and employment.

The Government also has a special interest in measures which would assist in guarding farmers and consumers against emergencies arising out of extremes of surpluses or shortages. The expense in the past to Federal, State, and local governments arising by reason of crop losses points to the desirability of employing the principle of insurance in order to lessen the cost—financial and human—of future crop disasters.

A program of crop insurance and storage of reserves should be part of the foundation of agricultural policy which we are building and which must include the conservation of soil and water, better land use, increased farm income, and alleviation of distress in rural areas arising out of factors beyond the control of individual producers.

May I repeat what I have suggested in a former message: That because economic and social reforms of this character are essentially national in scope and in administration, the citizens of our Nation believe that our form of government was never intended to prohibit their accomplishment.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1937.

INVALIDATION OF ACTS OF CONGRESS BY SUPREME COURT

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I am deeply aware that it may be construed as unseemly for a freshman Senator to take the time of the Senate by speaking, especially so when the subject of his remarks pertains, in some degree at least, to the functions of the Supreme Court, but I wish to speak for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate to a bill which was introduced by me about 2 weeks ago, and which, in my opinion, has some merit, and I wish to draw it to the attention of Senators for whatever worth they may feel it possesses.

The fundamental character of the issue of judicial overturn of legislative acts of the Congress, affecting as it does all our citizenry and all their interests, warrants fullest discussion and widest knowledge of any proposal for change. That self-evident fact is my justification for presuming now to take up a few minutes of the Senate's time.

I shall not attempt to discuss the Judiciary Act of 1789, an act concerning whose scope, effectiveness, and limitations, many and various arguments have been and can be made. I remind those who speak of usurpation by the Supreme Court that by that law the Congress itself granted to that tribunal certain jurisdiction to pass on the constitutionality of acts of Congress.

I shall confine myself to an attempt, in rather brief lay language, to tell about a simple proposal which, in my judgment, has a place in the consideration of the Congress and which, indeed, is desirable of enactment, regardless of what other steps may be taken as to the Supreme Court.

On this subject there are certain points which seem obvious even to those of us who do not profess to be profound constitutional lawyers. I do not and cannot claim to be versed in constitutional law, and so am not attempting any profound discussion of that nature.

In the grave situation which now confronts our country in connection with the efforts of our socially minded and forward-looking administration to take care of several vital national problems, there are certain possibilities of remedy or remedial aids which can be seen and appreciated by those of us of ordinary vision.

The bill which I have offered for consideration by the Congress consists of only nine lines, exclusive of the enacting clause. I shall read it:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 73), as amended (28 U. S. C., sec. 344), be amended by adding thereto the following: "No act of Congress, nor any part thereof, shall be held invalid, as contrary to the Constitution of the United States, by the Supreme Court, in any proceedings before it, unless the Court shall determine such invalidity to have been established beyond a reasonable doubt. The dissent of two or more Justices shall in and of itself constitute a reasonable doubt."

The sole purpose of this proposal is to have the Supreme Court itself, in cases of such importance, actually and uniformly to follow its own repeatedly professed and stated rule. In my judgment, this simple proposed statute accords with the Supreme Court's own tenets of construction and legislative standards which have been uniformly stated by it, but followed, in some cases, only to the degree that the exigency has demanded.

This bill defines a standard. The Court, especially in several recent decisions, has found fault with Congress for failure to state any sufficiently clear or explicit standard. To lay down definite standards is thus, by the Supreme Court's own pronouncement, not only recognized as a function of the legislature but has been affirmatively imposed upon Congress, under penalty of futility if we fail so to do.

I am aware that doubt, but doubt only, has been expressed by some based on the thought that a statute flatly requiring a certain number or percentage of the members of the Court to vote for the unconstitutionality of a law enacted by Congress in order to make such decision valid and binding may itself be a judicial process, and so unconstitutional. This bill avoids that pitfall. It does not contain a requirement that any certain percentage of the Court is necessary to overturn an act of Congress. It is a legislative definition of reasonable doubt. To do this is a legislative function. The bill provides, regardless of what the membership of the Court at any time may be, that whenever two or more members thereof reach the conclusion that an act of Congress is constitutional in opposition to the views of other members of the Court, such lack of unanimity in itself shall constitute what in fact it must be, reasonable doubt, and in that case the law as passed by Congress shall stand.

In sense and logic this proposal is on much firmer foundation than the recent unescapable implication in the A. A. A. case (U. S. v. Butler, 56 Sup. Ct. Repts. 312, p. 320 et seq.) In that case, although three members dissented, the six majority members presumed to follow this rule and to find that "by no reasonable possibility"—and I am assuming that "possibility" in this context is not substantially different from "doubt"—could the act be held constitutional. And this the Court held, if you please, Mr. President, after previously announcing in that decision the other well-known foundation for the validity of acts of the coordinate legislative branch, namely, page 320:

Every presumption is to be indulged in favor of faithful compliance by Congress with the mandates of the fundamental laws.

The opinion of three Justices joining in a most vigorous dissent was not sufficient in the minds of the majority six to create one presumption out of all the presumptions covered by the word "every", which the majority had just averred should stand in favor of the validity of the act of the coordinate Congress! Nor have four dissenters created a presumption in the minds of five! No outsider has ever passed on the members of the Court such strictures as these by its own majority.

How arbitrarily empty does the profession of following their own rule of necessity of determining a conclusion of invalidity beyond any reasonable doubt appear when the vigorous and logical dissent of Justice Stone, speaking for the three dissenting Justices, is read.

Stripped bare, the opinion of the six says that the opinion of the three speaking contra does not arise to the dignity of even raising a "reasonable possibility."

Thus the Supreme Court has itself furnished a most convincing example of the need of the definition made by the bill which I am now discussing.

For, having thus reaffirmed the rule uniformly presumed to be followed by the Supreme Court, Justice Roberts, speaking for five of his colleagues and himself, promptly disregards the implication of very grave doubt stated in the forceful words of the dissenting three, and proceeds to find beyond any "reasonable possibility" that there is neither expressed nor "reasonably to be implied" power in the coordinate branch to enact such a law, and, therefore, it must fall.

It would almost seem to be an act of kindness for Congress thus, by statute, to point out to the Court what should be obvious to all.

If more is needed to point the necessity of defining reasonable doubt by statute when applied in statutory construction, the great conflict of opinions in both Federal and State courts in such cases affords rather an overwhelming proof of such need. It also shows the total lack of holding to such rule for any purpose except a verbal standard to which varying degrees of adherence has been given as the bent of mind of the judges has dictated.

Clearly, then, the courts have in fact no uniform standard, but each court makes its own standard for the time and circumstance. The bill introduced by me lays down a standard, which is a legislative function; it lays down a reasonable standard which in no way impinges on the court's function, but is in aid of that function.

Just one word more, Mr. President. I do not believe that, in fairness to the Senate, I should neglect to say that I have not overlooked the case of United States v. Klein (80 U. S. 128), in which the Court struck down a proviso in an act because it attempts to prescribe a "rule of decision" to the "judicial department." But that case sought to have the Court oust itself, absolutely and without exception or discretion, from jurisdiction, concededly granted, in the midst of a proceeding, if and whenever it should find certain evidence to exist. The Court also found that the proviso impinged upon the Executive pardon power by denying to a pardon its legal and proper effect.

Such mandate by the Congress was analogous to an attempt by mandamus to compel a discretionary authority to act only in a required manner. The proposed act does nothing of this sort. It merely exercises a proper legislative function by laying down a standard. Under that standard the Court has complete power and discretion. To make the proposed act fall under the principle of the Klein case it would have to deny the Court the right to pass on constitutionality. This, of course, the bill does not do. On the contrary, it concedes such jurisdiction and states the standard in exact accord with the Court's own oft-stated principles of statutory construction.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GILLETTE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator's bill simply relate to acts of Congress or does it touch the power of the Supreme Court to overrule State statutes and State laws?

Mr. GILLETTE. It refers to the function of the Supreme Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, does the Senator construe his bill to cover also the constitutionality of State acts? Would the Senator allow the Supreme Court to retain its power to declare State acts unconstitutional without any restriction and put the restriction merely on its power to construe Federal laws?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, answering the Senator, my bill is designed simply to allow the Court to retain the jurisdiction it now has, but to prescribe a standard so that in the exercise of that jurisdiction it will follow the standard which Congress as a legislative body defines for it. It involves no change in the jurisdiction that now exists.

Mr. CONNALLY. If I understand the Senator correctly, his bill provides, in brief, that if two or more judges express a reasonable doubt, then the Court cannot hold an act unconstitutional?

Mr. GILLETTE. The bill expresses in exact words what the Supreme Court has so often stated in its decisions, that unconstitutionality must be determined beyond a reasonable doubt. Then it provides that the dissent of two or more Justices in the finding shall of itself constitute such reasonable doubt.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the point I am getting at. There may be six judges who are clearly of the opinion that an act is unconstitutional, but if three of them have any doubt, then the opinion of the three would govern. Is that correct?

Mr. GILLETTE. That would be the construction.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, instead of an act being upheld by two-thirds under the Senator's bill it would be upheld by one-third?

Mr. GILLETTE. That would be the effect.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would not vex the ears of the Senate at this time except that I cannot escape the feeling that I owe a duty not only to the Senate but as well to the country to speak on the subject of the bill to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, especially in view of the widespread misapprehension and misconception of what is within the four corners of the bill recommended to the Congress by the President in his message of February 5, which bill I introduced and which has been referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. President, that bill is the mildest of all the bills that could have been introduced on the subject, and in the present circumstances I marvel at the moderation of the President. Possibly I should apologize in advance for the all-too frequent use of the personal pronoun "I" that may swarm through this address, but I wish, first, to say that I have always resisted, and shall continue to resist, any bill or proposed constitutional amendment which would take away from the Supreme Court of the United States the power to examine acts of Congress and to declare them invalid if the Court finds them to be invalid. Moreover, I believe that the power does rest, and should rest, in the Supreme Court of the United States to declare acts of the various States invalid when the Supreme Court finds them to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. It has been well said that the Constitution of the United States is what the Supreme Court says it is. With that I agree in toto; that is the only rule that can be set up in our form of government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona, I am sure, did not realize that he used an expression which I think he did not mean to use. The Senator does not mean the Supreme Court of the United States, in its judgment, should have a right to declare a State statute invalid merely because it disagrees with it. The point of view of the Senator is that if the statute violates the Constitution of the United States, then it should be declared invalid.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite so; and I thank the Senator for his timely interruption.

Mr. President, while I fully agree with the statement—I do not know by whom it was made—that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is——

Mr. CONNALLY. It was the statement of Chief Justice Hughes.

Mr. ASHURST. Senators around me suggest the name of the distinguished Chief Justice, and others suggest that it was the dictum of the late lamented Oliver Wendell Holmes. I withdraw the adjective "lamented", for no human being will ever have cause to lament such a character as Oliver Wendell Holmes, a combination of scholar, philosopher, and lawyer, and what was called a "liberal" on the bench. He believed in the power and authority of the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress void when they were in opposition to the Constitution; he also believed in the power and authority and the duty of the Supreme Court of the United States to declare acts of the States invalid when they were in opposition to the Constitution of the United States.

I am opposed to any legislation which would in any way dictate to the Supreme Court and say to it that it may decide various acts to be unconstitutional only by a two-thirds vote or a 7-to-2 vote. I believe that the judicial power of this Government was rightly and wisely placed in the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe it would be harmful to the public interest and would not be keeping pace with the great forward movement of our country to take from the Supreme Court of the United States the power to declare laws invalid.

Therefore it will be perceived that I do not support and will not support the amendment proposed by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the able Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], who propose that if any act of Congress has been declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional, a referendum to the Congress shall be had upon the bill. I am not unaware of the fact that James Madison and John Marshall urged such a plan. The reason I am opposed to that proposition is that it would transfer the judicial power of this Government from the Supreme Court to the Congress.

It may be asked then how can I support the bill of the President? It is easy for me to do so, and that without any inconsistency, so far as I am able to perceive. I repeat that I marvel at the moderation of the President. He has a constitutional right and duty to urge legislation and he would be derelict in his duty if he failed to make suggestions to the Congress. It has been the subject of some criticism that, forsooth, he attached to his message the outline of a bill. But, Mr. President, he has the same right that every other citizen of this Republic possesses. Senators from time to time meet with their constituents and their constituents suggest bills and ask Senators to examine and introduce them. There is nothing wrong about that. The citizen has such a right and the President has as many rights on that subject as has any other citizen.

Summarizing, we find that the Constitution grants to the Congress the power to determine the number of judges who shall compose the Supreme Court of the United States; to fix the salaries of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the single exception that Congress may not—and it is a wise provision—reduce their salaries during their term of office, which is during good behavior, or, in fact, their lifetime; to determine and make regulations as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; to establish inferior courts and make all rules and regulations for such courts, including, of course, the personnel and jurisdiction.

Congress has from time to time changed and altered the number of judges composing the Supreme Court of the United States. I think George Washington appointed 11 judges, perhaps more. My learned friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] says 10. I hope no one rose and accused General Washington of "packing" the Supreme Court when he appointed 10 men to that bench.

The Supreme Court was established with 6 members in 1789. It was reduced to 5 members in 1801, increased to 7 under Thomas Jefferson in 1807, and was increased to 9 in 1837.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was decreased from 6 to 5 by the Federalists just as they went out of office so that Thomas Jefferson would not have power to appoint a new judge.

Mr. ASHURST. I have learned to depend upon the scholarship and learning of the able Senator from Texas, and while that particular point is not in my mind I believe it is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator very much. I shall not interrupt him any more. I merely wanted to leave the record clear.

Mr. ASHURST. The Supreme Court was increased to 9 in 1837, and in 1863 it was increased to 10; it was reduced to 7 in 1866 and increased to 9 in 1869. Possibly I would better discuss the subject of "packing" the Court before I pass on to some other subject.

No one yet has risen in the Senate, no one in the country has made himself so ridiculous as to suggest that this bill is unconstitutional. No one has yet made himself so ridiculous as to assert that this is unprecedented.

I adopt the language used a moment ago, because it was appropriate, by the learned Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on another matter in which he said his views expressed on the subject then before the Senate were his own views. I do not think I need give the Senate of the United States or the country any assurance that what I now say represents my own views. If I have ever established anything in this country, it is that my views are my own, reached by a process of reasoning or by whatever method one may choose to term it, and that I pride myself upon that rather rare virtue of correcting myself if I think I am wrong. I am not going into that subject, however, because I am not on trial. [Laughter.] But if any Senator wishes to bring forward any accusation against me of inconsistency, I am sure I shall not come out second best in such a colloquy. I may refer to this later.

In 1863 there was a President of the United States who was one of the mildest, one of the most even-tempered, patient, and tolerant men who ever sat in the office of the Chief Executive, a man of many trials, whose face it seemed was seared with the plowshare of sorrow—Abraham Lincoln. He was not glad or happy when he told witty stories. It was his way of ridding himself of the presence of bores. It was a way of approaching a subject directly. It was a way by which, instead of making labored arguments, he could dispose of a subject in a sentence.

The last man on earth our present generation would accuse of having been a dictator is Abraham Lincoln, yet vast sections of the country, both north and south of the Mason and Dixon line, denounced him as a dictator. I shall not here insult the Senate by repeating the Rabelaisian ribaldry used by agitators in the North during the war and before the war against Abraham Lincoln, because, forsooth, they did not believe he was stern enough. I do not choose in this presence to repeat the opprobrious epithets used against Lincoln by many northern statesmen during the war. We find that under his administration the Supreme Court was increased from 9 to 10; and speaking to a citizen eminent in that day, a Mr. Boutwell, Lincoln said:

> There are three reasons in favor of his appointment—

He was referring to the appointment of Mr. Chase as Chief Justice of the United States.

> There are three reasons in favor of his appointment and one very strong reason against it. First, he occupies the largest place in the public mind in connection with the office. Then, we wish for the Chief Justice one who will sustain what has been done in regard to emancipation and legal tender.

Who said that? The fiery Andrew Jackson? Who said that? Franklin Roosevelt? Who said that? Theodore Roosevelt, against whom the charge was often made of attempting to dictate? Abraham Lincoln said it. One of the most gentle of all our Presidents said:

> We wish for Chief Justice one who will sustain what has been done in regard to emancipation and legal tender.

President Roosevelt would scorn to use such language. I am not speaking for him. I have no authority to do so, but he would not utter such a sentiment. He would not insult Congress or the country by any such language.

It might interest Senators to know what happened in regard to Chase. He was nominated. Let me read first further what Lincoln said:

> We cannot ask a man what he will do. If we should ask him and he should answer us we would despise him for it.

Correct! If the President, in selecting material to fill a vacancy on the bench, should ask a man his opinion the man would despise him for it, and justly so. A President never asks anyone whom he considers for judicial appointment what his views would be. If he should ask any Senator what his views were to be, the Senator would walk from that distinguished presence if he were fit to be a Senator.

Chase was nominated and confirmed. As was pointed out by the learned Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] the other day, during the time Mr. Chase was Secretary of the Treasury he formulated, advocated, drew, and caused to be introduced the bill relating to the issuance of greenbacks to pay the expenses of the war. Later, when Mr. Chase became Chief Justice, he helped in the first Legal Tender case to strike down as unconstitutional the legal-tender law, and said in his opinion:

> My conclusions as Secretary of the Treasury have undergone revision.

He was courageous enough to correct what he though was an error.

Without going into the long details of the question, suffice it to say that on the day the first Legal Tender case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States there happened to be two vacancies on the Supreme Court. President Grant filled them by appointing Mr. Strong and Mr. Bradley. Upon a rehearing, the constitutionality of the legal-tender law was sustained.

But I come back to the mildness of the proposal of President Roosevelt. Out of the dozens of suggestions with reference to the Supreme Court he has adopted the most gentle. His proposal does not "tinker" with the Constitution. It does not "curb" the Supreme Court powers in any way. There is no suggestion in his recommendations to require a unanimous decision or a two-thirds majority or a 7-to-2 decision. There is nothing in the bill that in any way restricts the Supreme Court acting as it has in the past. There is no suggestion of a transfer of any of the judicial power of the Government from the Court to the Congress.

Mr. President, in all governments there reposes——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. My recollection is that some twenty-odd years ago the Senate passed an act intended to make it possible for the President to appoint new judges where sitting judges had become incapacitated by reason of physical or mental debility. My recollection is that that bill required the President to find as an affirmative fact that the sitting judge by reason of physical or mental condition was no longer fitted to perform his duties, and the bill provided that in that case the President might appoint an Associate Justice.

That bill passed the Senate and went to the House, and, as I recall, failed of passage in the House. The bill put upon the President the very unpleasant duty of ascertaining, by examination or other method, whether any sitting judge was disqualified by reason of physical or mental disability. Certainly the method now under discussion is a very charitable and a very kind measure compared to that, because the present measure not only relieves the President of the unpleasant duty of finding that any given judge is unfitted to perform his duty but it relieves the judge of the embarrassment of having it found that he is unfitted to perform his duty in order that the President may replenish the bench by the appointment of another judge.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has accurately stated the situation; and I had omitted—if it occurred to me at all—to add that fact or that feature in pointing out the mildness of the present proposal.

Again, as to this excitable cry about "packing" the Court: I have great respect for the American Bar Association. It is my regret that I am not able each year to attend their meetings, because at their sessions I would sit as Saul sat at the feet of Gamaliel and would be enlightened.

SEVERAL SENATORS. The Senator means "Paul."

Mr. ASHURST. No; he was Saul when he sat at the feet of Gamaliel, and after he saw the light he was Paul. Saul sat at the feet of Gamaliel, and Saul also was a distinguished alumnus of the university at Tarsus, where the rich Romans sent their sons for education.

But, getting back to the American Bar Association, I am sure Senators are fair enough not to accuse the American Bar Association of any attempt at any time to "pack" the Supreme Court. I am sure they will in advance acquit the American Bar Association of any so-called wild, radical ideas. But let me read to Senators a report submitted to the American Bar Association by a distinguished committee in 1921. This committee, after carefully considering the subject, made, among others, the following suggestions:

This report was signed by Everett P. Wheeler, chairman, a great lawyer. I knew him 25 years ago. This report was also signed by the distinguished Henry W. Taft; by Thomas J. O'Donnell; and by Mr. Henry B. F. Macfarland, one of the most distinguished lawyers in this District, gone now to where, beyond our voices, there is for him peace. It was signed by Mr. J. F. Loughborough, Mr. Robert P. Schick, Mr. Randolph Barton, Jr., Mr. Tore Teigen, Mr. William Hunter, and Mr. John R. Hardin. This committee of the American Bar Association—and this report was adopted—went on to say:

> It seems to your committee that the most important subject for inquiry in this connection is the composition of the Supreme Court of the United States. The great extension of Federal legislation to many subjects with which formerly it did not deal, and the many questions of difficulty arising out of the war, have thrown a heavy burden upon that Court. This burden could be relieved in one of two ways:
> 1. The right of appeal to the Supreme Court could be materially limited.
> 2. Provision could be made for increasing the number of Justices of the Court to 11, besides the Chief Justice. Six justices, as now, would constitute a quorum. The concurrence of five should be necessary to render a decision.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what is the date of that report?

Mr. ASHURST. It is found in the proceedings of the American Bar Association of the year 1921. I need not digress for any extended eulogy of the members of that committee or of the bar association in general.

It would be interesting to pursue for a moment what happened to the Presidents under whose administrations judgeships were created.

One of the learned Senators—I think it was the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]—mentioned John Marshall. Before Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated as President, Chief Justice Oliver Ellsworth resigned. John Marshall was a distinguished soldier and a distinguished lawyer remotely related to Thomas Jefferson. Family quarrels are sometimes the bitterest. Jefferson and Marshall never fraternized much socially and not at all politically.

Judges appointed by President Jefferson and President Madison joined with Chief Justice Marshall in sustaining and developing the strongly nationalistic interpretation of the Constitution so obnoxious to President Jefferson.

It is one of the sharpest ironies of our national history that when John Marshall was nominated for Chief Justice by President John Adams the feeling against Marshall in the Senate on the part of the Federalist Senators was strong, and he probably would have been rejected by the Federalist Senators except for the fact that President Adams definitely informed them—the Federalist Senators—that even if Marshall were not confirmed he, President Adams, would not nominate their choice, Judge Paterson. The Federalist Senators suspected Marshall of Republican tendencies.

President Jefferson was disgusted by the decision of John Marshall in the case of Aaron Burr at Richmond, Va., but President Jefferson was more than disgusted; he was enraged—if, indeed, a philosopher could be enraged—that the first act of judicial interference with Jefferson's embargo laws should have come from Judge William Johnson, of South Carolina, who granted a mandamus and announced a decision holding that Jefferson's instructions to the collector of the port of Charleston were illegal and void.

It will be remembered that under the Embargo Act of April 25, 1808, collectors of customs were required to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with cargo to United States ports whenever in their opinion the intention was to evade the embargo. In the enforcement of this law President Jefferson had assumed to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to instruct collectors to detain all vessels. Jefferson's resentment was fierce against Judge Johnson, a Democrat whom Jefferson had appointed to the Supreme Court from the Democratic State of South Carolina.

Judges appointed by President Jackson joined with Chief Justice Marshall and with Judge Story, who was appointed by President Madison, in supporting the Cherokee missionaries against Georgia in direct opposition to President Jackson. Judges appointed by President Jackson decided against his policy in relation to the Spanish land claims. Judges appointed by President Jackson and President Van Buren threw down the gauntlet to Jackson by issuing a mandamus against his favorite Postmaster General. In every case involving slavery, antislavery judges joined with proslavery judges in rendering the decision. The constitutionality of the obnoxious fugitive-slave law was upheld by antislavery Whig judges and by proslavery Democrats alike. A northern Democrat joined with a northern Whig judge in dissenting in the Dred Scott case. President Lincoln's legal-tender policy was held unconstitutional by his own appointees.

In the famous Milligan case in April 1866, within the short space of 3 weeks after the arguments the Supreme Court rendered its decision, holding that the Military Commission set up by President Lincoln was unlawful and void. The opinion of the Court holding Lincoln's tribunal illegal was delivered by Judge David Davis, Lincoln's personal appointee and close personal friend.

The reconstruction policies and acts of the Republican Party were held unconstitutional by a Republican bench. The constitutional views of the Democratic Party as to our insular possessions were opposed by a Democratic judge, who joined with his Republican associates in making up the majority in the Insular cases. Many other illustrations might be cited. Nothing is more obvious in the history of the Supreme Court of the United States than the manner in which the hopes of those who might have expected a judge to follow the political views of the President appointing him have been disappointed.

The Supreme Court of the United States is and ought to be independent of the Army, independent of the Navy, independent of the Treasury, independent of patronage, and independent of popularity.

There sits on my left the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is far more familiar with the Milligan case than I happen to be; but it will be remembered that the mild-mannered President Lincoln was accused in his day of setting up a military tribunal. Lincoln, to the Supreme Bench, appointed, among other men, his—Lincoln's—own personal friend and his own personal attorney, David Davis; and yet, when the military tribunal was questioned before the Supreme Court, that bench, after 3 weeks' consideration, in 1866, destroyed and struck down Lincoln's military tribunal; and Judge David Davis—Lincoln's friend and personal attorney—read the opinion of the Court. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is correct, as he always is.

Mr. ASHURST. So, Mr. President, of all the impossible arguments, of all the insulting arguments that ever could be made, the most impossible and insulting would be that the President would presume to suggest to any prospective appointee how he—the appointee—should decide a case; and any man fit to wear the judicial ermine, any man fit to sit upon the bench, I repeat for the third time, would be justly insulted by any suggestion as to how he should decide any case.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I dare say the Senator from Arizona will pardon me if I continue briefly his history of David Davis.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. He was from the State of Illinois.

Mr. ASHURST. He was.

Mr. LEWIS. His home was Bloomington, Ill. He was elected to the Senate as a Democrat. His attitude of mind changed in some ways. He was made President of the Senate; and it was while he was President of the Senate—my able friend is quite correct—that he was designated to the Supreme Court by Lincoln, and promptly demonstrated his independence of thought by deciding against President Lincoln.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. That is immaterial to the Senator's argument, but I wish to take credit to my State of Illinois.

Mr. ASHURST. Davis was on the bench, as the Senator correctly says, from Illinois. When the Hayes-Tilden controversy arose, Davis was taken by the Legislature of Illinois from the bench and elected to the Senate.

Mr. President, I now return to the fact that the bill does not take any judicial power from the Supreme Court. I do not believe that a bill proposing to lodge judicial power in the Congress would receive 20 votes in the Senate of the United States. I do not believe that any constitutional amendment proposing to take judicial power from the Supreme Court and lodge it with Congress would be ratified. We have no judicial power at all, except regarding impeachments and the determination of the qualifications of our own Members. That is all the judicial power we have. That is all we should have.

In the course of the debate which I believe will ensue upon this bill no Senator will be heard to say that this bill takes any judicial power from the Supreme Court and gives it to Congress. No Senator, during the course of the debate, will be heard to say that this bill is unconstitutional. Some of them, being good judges of morals, may say that it is immoral. It may be this or that. They have the right to say that it may be unwise; but, whatever this bill is, it does not take from the Supreme Court one iota, one jot or title of judicial power. It does not give to the Congress any judicial power.

If it gave judicial power to the Congress, I would be on my feet opposing it rather than advocating it.

Mr. President, in 1869 the number of judges was fixed at nine. The population of our country then was thirty-eight and one-half million. Now the population is 128,000,000, and the business of the Supreme Court has quintupled in these 68 years.

In 1921 the American Bar Association urged that additional judges be appointed, and if my particular views be of importance, who other than I has stood on the floor of the Senate for nearly 15 years urging more judges, more judges, more judges? I treasure the friendship which exists between me and the Senators from New York. I almost irritated them during the last session of the Congress by my insistent demand that a certain district in their State should have two more judges in order to carry on the business. It was not a pleasant task.

Who for the past 15 years has led the demand here for more judges? I, myself. The first bill I introduced at this session of the Congress, as soon as I could get the floor, was a bill creating an additional judgeship in the State of Georgia, a bill creating an additional judgeship in the State of Washington, creating an additional judgeship in the State of Louisiana, and one in the State of Texas. I am advised that the able Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] proposes to introduce a bill to create two additional circuit judgeships in the ninth circuit. I am for the bill. I hope he will make haste and introduce it. The ninth circuit is larger than any other. That circuit hears appeals from China, Hawaii, and Alaska, and is composed of Arizona, California, Nevada, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana. It is a great circuit with five judges. The fourth circuit needs an additional judge, as does the second. I could go on at some length along this line.

Mr. President and Senators, the President's proposal, in my judgment, meets the needs and demands of the country. I need not, after his message and after what has been pointed out by many Senators, spend any time descanting upon the fact that this is a government of law, and when cases are pending from 3 to 5 years in some of the courts, as they have been, and in some 10 years, it becomes outrageously unjust to the citizen, for it is a trite expression that delayed justice is justice denied.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. One of the unaccountable things that arises in connection with the proposed legislation is that there is general acceptance of the plan of the President insofar as it applies to the so-called inferior courts; that is, the district courts and the circuit courts of appeal of the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that is true with respect to retirement, and true with respect to the appointment of additional judges.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true.

Mr. ROBINSON. The whole fire of the opposition has been concentrated and directed on the proposal as it relates to the Supreme Court. I want someone to tell me why a different rule, either with respect to retirement or with respect to the appointment of additional judges, should be applied to the district courts and to the circuit courts of appeal from that which is applied to the Supreme Court of the United States.

If it be admitted that as to the judges of the so-called inferior courts there comes a time in life when physical and mental powers usually are diminished and impaired, I ask now, what is there either in the functions of the Supreme Court or in the personality of the members of the Supreme Court that warrants the conclusion that those who have the greatest responsibilities, those whose duties are most arduous, those who have the final judgment upon questions relating to the constitutionality of State statutes and acts passed by the Congress, should be held exempt from the contemplated provisions of law that are designed to assure vigor and capacity both with respect to physical and mental being on the part of the judges who pass upon the questions in the first instance?

Why should a judge who has become decrepit or senile be distinguished or discriminated in favor of because he is vested with the authority to pass final judgment? If it will not be interrupting the Senator——

Mr. ASHURST. I gladly yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not wish to trespass upon the Senator's time.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator's interruption is going to prove one of the strongest parts of my speech, and I yield to him gladly. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot accept that compliment without protest. Modesty compels me to say that in that particular I do not agree with the Senator from Arizona. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me add to what I have said with the indulgence of the Senator from Arizona a further statement.

A young man who happens to have my name, who represents the Associated Press, and who serves in the press gallery, asked me yesterday whether I had read the article by Mr. Walter Lippmann published just a day or two ago on the constitutional crisis. Everyone who knows Mr. Lippmann esteems him highly and regards him as a great writer, and some of us think of him as a philosopher.

Mr. Lippmann recognizes that there are two ways of approaching this subject, and like myself, he has preferred the constitutional-amendment process. In his article, to which reference has just been made, is contained a declaration which is common to the experience of every Senator here. We have all studied this subject. I had thought that I should refrain from any expression on it in the Senate until the bill was before this body. But the issue is now most prominent of any in the mind of the American people, and there is a strongly organized force seeking to control every publicity agency in the United States to cry down this plan for reorganization of the judiciary as something unfair and subversive.

The Senator from Arizona has declared and demonstrated that no one has questioned the constitutionality of the plan. Many have said that the easiest and most direct way of approach is through a constitutional amendment, but Mr. Walter Lippmann discloses the impracticability of meeting existing conditions with respect to the courts by an amendment to the Constitution. I am going to read what he said:

> Ever since the N. R. A. decision in 1935 I have been collecting proposed amendments, but thus far I have never seen one which seemed to me desirable or practicable.

This great man has been at work 2 years; he has gathered together all the amendments that have been proposed; he believes in a constitutional amendment rather than in legislation to remedy existing conditions, and yet he declares, after working 2 years and gathering together all of the proposals that have been made, that he has never seen one that is practicable or desirable.

Then he finally reaches a conclusion, and do Senators know what his conclusion is? Listen to it. It is that the Constitution ought to be amended so as to make it easy to change the Constitution in the particulars that you desire and difficult to amend it in the particulars that you oppose amendment.

Some years ago when we had all the discussion about stock and bond speculation an eminent Washington society woman is reputed to have declared that she had discovered how to make money easily by dealing in stocks. Someone asked her what the process was, and she replied complacently, "Buy them when they are low and sell them when they are high." [Laughter.] And that is the plan that my friend Mr. Walter Lippmann, who is opposed to the President's plan, suggests for remedying the existing situation—make it easy to amend the Constitution when you wish to and difficult to amend it when you do not desire to amend it; just as if there is any concurrence of opinion on the part of the public or on the part of the legislators as to in what particulars the Constitution should be easily amended and as to in what particulars it should be difficult to amend it. It is true, that, insofar as civil rights and democratic principles are concerned, he would make it very difficult to change the Constitution, but, so far as economic propositions are concerned, he would make it easy to amend the Constitution. Then he discloses that he does not know how he would do it after those 2 years of study.

I quote further:

> My suggestion is that a study be made of some other way of amending the Constitution with a view to excluding from the easier methods of amendment all democratic rights and civil liberties.
> So I argued that what was really wanted was to make it easier to amend section 8, which enumerates the powers of Congress, and to leave it just as hard to amend the rest of the Constitution. My idea then is to amend the amending clause of the Constitution by providing an easier method of amendment in regard to the power to regulate commerce. I do not see any reason why there should not be provided an easy way to amend one part of the Constitution and a hard one to amend other parts.

Two years' thought and study of the subject by this great man, and the conclusion that he comes to, after having exhausted his great mental powers, is that you ought to amend the Constitution first so as to make it easy to amend it in regard to the regulation of commerce and leave it difficult to amend it regarding other things. That illustrates some of the inconsistencies in the position and the arguments of those who say that this proposition is in some mysterious way a subversion of the fundamental rights of the people.

I think I have presumed on the kindness of the Senator from Arizona too long. I thank him for yielding, and on some future occasion I shall resume a discussion of the subject.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was not meant as a mere pleasantry when I said that the interruption by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] might prove, and probably will prove, to be the strongest part of my speech. I am grateful to him for adverting to the question of the ages of Justices. Since the legislation has been proposed pundits and scholars have assembled a list of the men from the days of antiquity to the present time who did great work after the age of 70, but they were exceptions.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield now to the able Senator from North Carolina, and I will say that when the telegraphic dispatches reached me that the Senator from that State had been reelected I rejoiced, and I rejoice now that that superb intellect is here with us to help us in this matter, whatever views we may hold or whatever positions we may take upon the subject.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. I will say that I also rejoiced when I heard that the Senator from Arizona had been reelected for the fifth time.

Mr. ASHURST. Politically I have put on immortality! I am on the other side of the resurrection politically.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Arizona is the only Senator who occupies his position without a predecessor or, I might almost say, even without the possibility of a successor.

In view of the fact that our leader, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, assisted the Senator from Arizona in proving a great point, I myself am going to try to assist him further.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall try to do so by asking a question. I wish to ask the Senator if, as reported in the newspapers, he spoke the following words?—

> And among the unjust criticisms which have been uttered, or printed, rather, about President Roosevelt was that he intended at some time—nobody knows when or where—to increase by some legerdemain—nobody knows when or where—the membership of the Supreme Court of the United States, so that his policies might be sustained. A more ridiculous, absurd, and unjust criticism of a President was never made. * * * No person whose opinion is respected has favored attempting such a reckless foray and folly.

I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona whether that is an accurate quotation from the newspaper of his remarks?

Mr. ASHURST. It is obvious from the rhetoric that that is my utterance. The rhetoric alone carries its own proof. I ask the Senator to allow me to say that the complete sentence I used may not be there, but it is not the first time I have made a statement along that line. My statement contained the words: "Any attempt to increase the Court to secure a particular decision on a particular case." Add those words to the quotation and I can bear with equanimity any charge of inconsistency the able Senator may bring.

Mr. President, I did not intend to talk about the charge made against me of being inconsistent. There was published a few days ago in the Washington News——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to say that I did not charge the Senator with being inconsistent. I think he is very consistent. I simply asked him if he made the statement which I read. I think he is entirely consistent. One may be consistently inconsistent.

Mr. ASHURST. As I said before, all one needs to do is to look at the rhetoric to know that the expression is mine. It carries its own proof.

Here is an article from the News of February 15, entitled "Henry, Thou Art a Jewel." [Laughter.] I secured as many copies of that article as I could; and if Senators have not received a copy, it is because I have been too busy to send them one. When I was sworn in as a Senator, now nearly 25 years ago—a third of a good lifetime—I had no secret reservation, and I resolved that I should never try to be consistent.

My faults are obvious. There can be no doubt that I have my full share of faults. I suffer from cacoëthes loquendi, a mania or itch for talking, and from vanity, if you please, and morbidity [laughter], and, as is obvious to everyone who knows me, an inborn, an inveterate flair for histrionics.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Permit me to finish my sentence. But there never has been superadded to these vices of mine the withering and embalming vice of consistency.

Now I yield to the able Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I believe the Senator knows, and everyone in the United States knows, that Daniel Webster was the greatest defender of the Supreme Court, and was known as the expounder of the Constitution. He generally opposed any legislation of any kind that would have any effect in any way on the Supreme Court, but when the members of the Court grew old, about 1823, and the public was very generally dissatisfied with the Supreme Court, may I ask the Senator if it is not true that Daniel Webster himself introduced in the House of Representatives a bill to increase the membership of the Supreme Court by three, and that he gave as a reason, in writing to one of his friends somewhere, that it was necessary to do that so that two judges could be appointed from a certain section of the United States in order to allay the very intense feeling against the Supreme Court? Is that historically correct?

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator has, indeed, as far as my memory serves—it has been some years since I read it—stated with precision and accuracy the attitude at that time of Daniel Webster.

Mr. President, I knew that I ought to be hazed on the charge of inconsistency; but the Senate has some sense of humor. It is useless to attempt to tell the country that I am not inconsistent; but let me say that whoever in his public service is handcuffed and shackled by the vice of consistency will be a man not free to act as various questions come before him from time to time; he will be a statesman locked in a prison house the keys to which are in the keeping of days and events that are dead. I would rather leave this august presence and walk out of yonder door than to be shackled, handcuffed, and gyved to events and days that are dead. Perhaps I cannot quote accurately what Emerson said about consistency, but let me try to do so. He said "consistency"——

Mr. LEWIS. "A foolish consistency"——

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator—"a foolish consistency."

Mr. LEWIS. "Is the hobgoblin of little minds."

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Illinois is correct. "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen." I cannot, however, use that quotation with any degree of appositeness in this presence, because nobody here is accused of "a foolish consistency", and here there are no "little minds" and no "little statesmen." [Laughter.] I spoke of my vice, cacoëthes loquendi, a mania to talk. There is another vice of mankind called cacoëthes carpendi, the mania to find fault, the mania of carping against everything that somebody else proposes but never suggesting a remedy yourself. Such is cacoëthes carpendi, a vice not wholly unknown in this Chamber. [Laughter.]

The able Senator from Arkansas adverted to the question of age. I long ago formed a friendship, which I treasured highly, with ex-President Taft, subsequently Chief Justice of the United States. Whatever may have been his merits or demerits as a statesman—and I think his merits were many—he was a great lawyer and a great judge, whose decisions enriched the legal annals of our country. He wrote—the statement was not made in a political speech where passion or expediency might have been indulged, but in his book Popular Government, published in 1913 (pp. 158–160):

> There is no doubt that there are judges at 70 who have ripe judgments, active minds, and much physical vigor, and that they are able to perform their judicial duties in a very satisfactory way. Yet, in a majority of cases, when men come to be 70, they have lost vigor, their minds are not as active, their senses not as acute, and their willingness to undertake great labor is not so great as in younger men, and as we ought to have in judges who are to perform the enormous task which falls to the lot of Supreme Court Justices. In the public interest, therefore, it is better that we lose the services of the exceptions—

I may say, interpolating, that the exceptions are numerous. They are obvious in this body, for some of the ablest Members of the Senate who are constantly on duty are over 70 years of age. President Taft continues:

> In the public interest, therefore, it is better that we lose the services of the exceptions who are good judges after they are 70 and avoid the presence on the bench of men who are not able to keep up with the work or to perform it satisfactorily. The duty of a Supreme Judge is more than merely taking in the point at issue between the parties and deciding it. It frequently involves a heavy task in reading records and writing opinions. It thus is a substantial drain upon one's energy. When most men reach 70 they are loath thoroughly to investigate cases where such work involves real physical endurance.

Who made that statement? Was it someone on the hustings shouting to an excited populace? No; it is the voice of William Howard Taft, in his book, speaking from experience and as to judges over the age of 70.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the bill as introduced and under the Constitution, Congress cannot force the retirement of judges when they reach the age of 70.

Mr. ASHURST. No; it cannot.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well. Suppose 6 new judges should be appointed because 6 of the present ones are over 70; then when the 6 new ones reach the age of 70, would 6 more have to be appointed, making 21, thus continuing building up this "old men's club"?

Mr. ASHURST. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would have to follow that when the 6 proposed to be added to the Court reached 70, 6 more would have to be appointed to take their places, provided no Justice died in the meantime.

Mr. ASHURST. No; the bill proposes to limit the number to 15.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that; but, according to my philosophy, when the 6 new Justices reach the age of 70, 6 more would have to be appointed. Is not that correct?

Mr. ASHURST. When the Senator discourses upon law and discusses history and literature, I bow to him; but the Senator does not belong in the realm of philosophers. [Laughter.] That is a realm out of which it is safer for him to stay. He is safe in his scholarship ventures and in legal matters; but, let me tell it to him as a dear friend, do not enter the domain of philosophy; the Senator is too young for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I think it was the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] who spoke of Daniel Webster as inveighing against the Supreme Court. If I have ever said anything about the Court in this presence or elsewhere, it has been said only in the greatest respect. No one has a higher respect for the Justices of the Supreme Court than have I. They deal with ever-present and complex propositions involving national sovereignty and the sovereignty of 48 different States, so that the questions which they are called upon to consider are indeed difficult and complex. I am trying to assist them. I am told now—I am not asserting this to be a fact, because I have not verified it, but the gentleman who advised me asserts it to be a fact—that the petitions for writs of certiorari alone run into the hundreds. There is a record to be read; there is a brief for the application of the writ and a brief for the denial of the writ; and such petitions and the briefs alone aggregate thousands of printed pages—25,000 or 30,000 pages—annually. Somebody must read them all, and I am assuming that the Justices of the Supreme Court read those thousands upon thousands of printed pages.

So, Mr. President, whatever may have been my vices—and I have recounted them—I am exempt from the charge that I have ever said aught of disrespect against the Justices of the Supreme Court.

One of my early boyhood idols—and I have never forgotten him—was a great Senator from New York, Roscoe Conkling. I have quoted him more often than I have any other Senator, and have done so during my mature life. It was charged that he was proud, and the charge was true. He walked in the wide, free air as though there flowed within his veins the blood of a hundred kings, and my youthful spirit thrilled whenever I read any of Roscoe Conkling's speeches. He never "crooked the pregnant hinges of the knee"; he was a great Senator, but to my surprise I found that he had so far forgotten himself, Republican that he was, as to use, when he was a Member of the House of Representatives in 1859, the language I am about to quote. He went on to say in delivering a violent assault upon the Supreme Court that—

> Wherever a decision, in the judgment of Congress, is subversive of the rights and liberties of the people, or is otherwise hurtfully erroneous, it is not only the right but the solemn duty of Congress to disregard it.

Mr. President, I do not agree with that great man, and it is not to his credit, as a statesman or a lawyer, that he could have proclaimed anywhere that it is the duty of Congress to disregard decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. If the Senator from Arizona feels that the question I am about to ask is not altogether fair, I would not feel badly if he should decline to answer it.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Washington would not and could not ask an unfair question. I am sure in advance that whatever question he may ask will be directed to acquiring information, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BONE. I wonder if the Senator will not agree with me that today there is in the hearts of millions of Americans a definite conviction and a hope that if the proposed change in the Supreme Court is brought about there will thereafter follow a change in the current of its decisions? I mean by that, a change of viewpoint, if I may put it in that way, which will reflect itself in a different attitude toward social legislation.

I ask the Senator that question because I have listened with close attention to his speech, which I have greatly enjoyed. He has referred to the fact that the Supreme Court will remain precisely as it is, not only a court of last resort but a court that shall ultimately determine, without any external influence, vital questions that Congress is trying to decide in a legislative way. If that be true, I am wondering just what sort of picture we present to the Court in our arguments here, if this hope, which is impressed upon me by letters I receive and from books and magazines I read, that there is to be a change in the viewpoint of the Court may not be realized.

I am wondering what the attitude of the Senator might be toward that particular problem, because obviously it is a problem. The American people as a whole believe that the Court will change its mind toward things like child-labor legislation. I have voted for this kind of legislation, and I have seen the Supreme Court destroy it. It would avail nothing to me as a progressive person if a court somewhat differently constituted should destroy that kind of legislation. That is the great interest I have in the question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I doubt if the Senator from Washington was here when, in the initial part of my remarks, I descanted at some length upon how judges appointed felt free to differ from the views of the President. The Senator from Washington would not vote to confirm any man who put his hands into the hands of another man and said, "If I go on the bench, I will vote thus and so to sustain your views." The Senator from Washington is too proud, too good a lawyer, to vote to confirm any man who gives any assurance in advance as to what his attitude will be when he takes the bench.

Mr. BONE. I am constrained to agree with the Senator, but we are here dealing with a very concrete fact. That concrete fact is an organized public opinion, a public opinion that is being built around certain arguments which have been advanced. One is that if we could get a Court expanded in number we would and could hope for a more wholesome viewpoint, a more progressive viewpoint, a more humane viewpoint than that expressed in some of the decisions which seem to be based upon pure legalism. I do not believe we can walk away from that. As the representatives here of the people, we deal with human emotions that the people have in their hearts. The people vote for the Senator from Arizona and vote for me and for other Members of this body because they believe we are going to see and understand the aspirations in their hearts, and they want this kind of legislation. I do not believe I am wrong in that viewpoint.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not going to be driven or led into any statement that by even remote conjecture might be said to put me into a position of being favorable to an increase in the number of the members of the Supreme Court in order that they may render a particular decision upon a particular subject. I decline to adopt that particular philosophy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish to go into the details of the history of the Supreme Court, but is it not historically true that from time to time there have been periodical ebbs and flows in the tide of judicial continuity even in the Supreme Court with respect to its attitude upon matters apparently similar but arising in different periods of the country's history?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly. The Supreme Court of the United States has—and I think justly—reversed itself. I cannot say how many times, but surely threescore times, it has reversed its former opinions, and I think to its credit. Every lawyer knows what it is to make a motion for a rehearing. In the lower courts one cannot even appeal until he first has filed his motion for a rehearing and had it decided.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I know the Senator will understand my question was to get information. I am sure my position is made evident by the provisions of a bill which I introduced just a few days ago relating to the number of judges on the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator did a splendid public service, and I am for it.

Mr. BONE. There are now five judges on the circuit court of appeals. Twenty years ago there were only four, but the litigation in that court has increased to a point so that each of the five judges now has 70 percent more appeals filed than confronted the judges 20 years ago. Their problem is intensified by post-war legislation and post-war conditions and the great intricacies of our economic business structure.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a great many learned people say we ought to have a Government like England, where Parliament is the supremely legislative and supremely judicial authority. I do not agree with those persons. I do not believe Congress should be supremely legislative and supremely judicial. I think the Supreme Court should be supremely judicial, and not the Congress.

The able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose services in the Senate have given glory to himself and to the country, in the course of an address or a letter or an article which he published a year or more ago pointed out that even before we achieved our independence some courts in the colonies had declared acts of the colonial legislature to be void. The erudite Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] made an investigation, if I am advised correctly, to see if any such decisions had been rendered. He did not find the number to be as great as that number set forth by the able Senator from Idaho, but he did find some.

Let me say that before we became an independent nation the colonies, through the judicial branch of their government, when they found an act of their legislative body to be in conflict with the colonial charter, they declared it to be void and of no effect. When our founding fathers set up this Government they were most careful to see that there was a distribution of the powers—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive. The reason why the Parliament of England is supremely legislative and also supremely judicial is that William the Conqueror, who defeated Harold at the Battle of Hastings in 1066, scarcely had taken his seat upon the throne when he created in his own hall the curia regis or aula regis—a court to make laws and to declare the laws it made. That principle has been carried on down through parliaments for many centuries. Hence the law enacted by Parliament is the law.

But we do not want that form of government. In our turbulent democracy, in our great desire to promote human liberty, we do not trust the judicial power to the Congress of the United States. While I am always ready to defend the Congress, we do not need that power and we could not use it properly. The judicial power belongs to the Supreme Court.

In England the supreme legislative power is in the Parliament and the supreme judicial power is also in the Parliament. We will do very well if we confine ourselves to the exercise of our legislative powers without attempting to take over the judicial powers. If the bill suggested by the President in the most remote approach looked toward Congress' acquiring any judicial power, I would be here declaiming against it; but I said in the beginning of my remarks that it does not take from the courts any of their judicial power.

The President, however, is rather strangely situated in the present condition of the public mind. He has two species of opposition, and I now in this great forum concede to his opponents honesty and integrity of mind. Some of his best friends in the Senate do not agree with him on this subject. Some of the best intellects in the Senate do not agree with the President. For them I have great respect. I have no right to horiscope the opinion of any Senator, but if the able senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] sees fit to disagree with the President, I know the processes of the Senator's mind and the integrity and judgment with which he reaches his conclusion.

The President, nevertheless, is between two fires, between two sets of public opinion. One declares he has gone too far. We hear it everywhere that he has gone too far. The other public opinion is that he has not gone far enough. Mr. President, he has turned neither to the right nor to the left. He has plowed a straight furrow forward.

I see sitting before me the able senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. More than 50 years ago there came into Arizona from the State of Texas several hundred of those rare and racy spirits driving thundering herds of cattle. The cowboys, as they drove those herds, sang their folklore songs. The words have perished, but the lilt of the songs still lingers; and those rare and racy spirits, the cowboys, so noted throughout our country for their verve and courage, became the knights—indeed, the only knighthood we ever had in America—and among the songs that they sang was "Git along, little dogie, git along."

The dogies were the thin, undernourished, spindling, motherless calves. The cowboy knew that if those dogies could be nourished and cared for and fed, they would at the market place within 2 or 3 years richly reward the care the owner had bestowed upon them. The cowboys never sang, "Git along, you longhorns."

They knew that the longhorns, in their strength, would reach water and grass. Their solicitude was for the weaker ones.

So it is with human society. The cowboy gave to the world an evidence of his familiarity with philosophy. He knew that his herd could travel only as fast and as far as the slowest and weakest could go; hence, his solicitude for the weakest. So it is with human society. With all of our accomplishments in art, science, sculpture, architecture, chemistry, economics, statesmanship, medicine, and the things that ameliorate human suffering, we have tickled Nature until she has laughed forth her most closely hidden secrets. To this generation has been given the keys to the kingdom of the material sciences; but with all our grand achievements we are not going to go any faster than the slowest of our people can go.

This slow progress may be irksome and irritating to those persons who are gifted or fortunate and who, therefore, laudably desire more rapidly to achieve beneficent results in government and in ameliorating distress; but this slow advance of society is an immutable law of natural philosophy and physics that admits of no amendment or repeal.

The President, in my judgment, in the bill that he transmitted to Congress, proposed the slowest, the easiest, the least drastic measure of all that had been suggested. It is not unconstitutional. It is not without precedent. It has been done several times before.

I searched my imagination—which Senators know is vivid—and the fleetest and most remote excursion of my imagination cannot find a measure less drastic, more surely constitutional, more truly justified by precedent, than this measure, granting neither to the Congress nor to the President judicial power. It was once suggested by the American Bar Association to increase the Supreme Court membership. It has been suggested by Senators from time to time. The President has met the requirements of calm reason. He has not attempted to overdrive. He has not attempted to do those things that were impossible.

It is not the beautiful speeches, it is not alone the ideals that we entertain, but it is the power to translate ideals into concrete activities for human good, that gives greatness to men like Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, and Franklin Roosevelt.

Will the Senate pardon me for adverting again to Conkling? You see how I cling to my idol. Conkling was attempting to nominate General Grant for a third term, and in the convention of 1880 he used a sentence that sticks like a burr in my memory, and has been there ever since I first read it. It is fine rhetoric. There is only one adjective in it. Speaking of Grant, Conkling said:

> His greatness is not alone the greatness of things written and of things said, but the arduous greatness of things done.

And when Clio with her iron pen comes to write history, whether she write upon the printed page, upon parchment, or upon clay or stone, she will write down that no one in your day, Senators, ever more nobly strove for the common good than the present President of the United States for his greatness is the greatness of things done. His solicitude has been to give all men an equal chance.

I believe in the right of men to acquire money. We hear men say "property rights—property rights!" Why, there is no such thing as property rights. That is a misnomer that should have been discarded years ago. The right of men to acquire property, both large and small, is one of the most precious of all human rights. An insensate piece of paving stone has no right, has no feeling. When men talk about property rights, I believe they must mean the right of men to acquire property, both large and small. I do not believe in any restrictions on the right of the citizen to acquire wealth, be it great or small; but we have a right to ask in this country, and it is going to be asked, that men of great wealth shall contribute their part of the burden in the way of taxes to help support the Government under which they built up their great fortunes. The fact that a man has acquired his millions or his scores of millions does not arouse any envy in my breast. We do not ask him, except for purposes of taxation, "How much have you?" But we have a right to ask, "How did you get it?" That is one of the rights of the American Congress. It is a right we should and do possess.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I had expected. I have spoken from the conviction that it was my duty to speak at this time; and if I have been able in a small degree to point out that the bill does not seek to take from the Supreme Court any judicial power, that it has abundant precedent, that an increase in the Supreme Court has been recommended from time to time by bar associations and by various Senators—if I have been able to throw some light upon that subject, I shall be content with my time and labor of today.

HEALTH AND SANITATION IN FLOOD AREAS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is my intention to move an executive session, and, following that, an adjournment until Monday, when the calendar may be called.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean that no bills are to be taken up today?

Mr. ROBINSON. It was not my intention to have that done.

Mr. COPELAND. There is one matter, if I may call it to the attention of the Senate, which is very important. I refer to Senate Joint Resolution 79, being Calendar No. 101.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that both the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] are anxious to have that measure considered.

Mr. COPELAND. My anxiety lies in the fact that the United States Public Health Service, through the Treasury Department, is making a very urgent request that immediate action be taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I suggest to the Senator that he ask for the consideration of the joint resolution, or move its consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 101, being Senate joint resolution 79.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment? Is that measure similar to House Joint Resolution 229, which has been passed by the House?

Mr. COPELAND. It is; and I shall move at the proper time to substitute the House joint resolution for the Senate measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know the Senator is going to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN of Michigan in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) making funds appropriated for emergency relief available for health and sanitation activities in the flood areas.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that House Joint Resolution 229, which is for the same purpose and has passed the House, be substituted for the Senate joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 229) to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to allocate funds to the United States Public Health Service for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods from the appropriation made in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, as supplemented by the appropriation for relief and work relief in the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1937, for the following purposes: (1) Grants to States for the purpose of aiding such States, or any county, health district, or other political subdivision thereof, in establishing and maintaining adequate public-health services in the prevention and control of diseases in the areas recently stricken by floods, under regulations prescribed by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service; (2) the employment of personnel in the city of Washington and elsewhere, without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to replace commissioned officers and other employees of such Public Health Service detailed to such areas; (3) reimbursement of appropriations of such Service for expenditures made from such appropriations for emergency work in such areas; and (4) the purchase of supplies and equipment to replace articles furnished from stock on hand for the care, support, and maintenance of flood refugees and in rendering assistance to health authorities.

The allocations made by authority of this joint resolution shall not be exclusive but shall be in addition to those which otherwise may be made under the provisions of such Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, as supplemented.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of this joint resolution is to permit the United States Public Health Service to cooperate with the States in guarding against disease in the flood-stricken areas. I wish, in just a moment's statement, to praise the Public Health Service for what it has done.

The great danger of the recent flood lies in the fact that typhoid fever will follow immediately, and malaria after a little while. The Public Health Service, in cooperation with the States, has inoculated already—just think of the figures—1,600,000 persons. It has used 80 gallons of serum for this purpose; and when we remember that 7 drops is a dose we can imagine what great work has been accomplished. The joint resolution provides for grants to the States for the purpose of assisting them in their work in this specific field, and for reimbursement to the Public Health Service for what it has spent from its own funds for this specific purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In order to emphasize what the Senator has said about the importance of immediate action, I wish to call attention to the fact that 177 counties in 11 States have been affected by the flood, and that the population of the flood-stricken area amounts to 7,746,000. Preliminary reports show that the homes of 1,205,000 persons were flooded, and that 740,000 persons were cared for by the Red Cross. The number of homes that were abandoned and must be repaired and cleaned up because of this disastrous flood mounts into the thousands; and, while temporary provision has been made between the Public Health Service of the United States and the State public-health services for immediate action to ward off epidemic and disease for the next 30 days, action on this measure is immediately necessary in order to continue the work, to reimburse the Public Health Service for what it has already done, and to make grants to the States and counties for the continuation of the service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, Representative EDWARD TAYLOR, of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, has made a report on this very joint resolution; and I ask unanimous consent that the entire report of Mr. TAYLOR on this subject be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 262) submitted by Mr. TAYLOR on February 18, 1937, is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred House Joint Resolution No. 229, to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods, report the same without amendment and with a recommendation for its immediate consideration and passage.

The purpose of the joint resolution is to permit funds, made available in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, as supplemented, to be allocated to the Public Health Service for grants to States for the purpose of aiding such States, or any county, health district, or other political subdivision thereof in establishing and maintaining adequate public health services in the prevention and control of diseases in the areas recently stricken by floods under regulations prescribed by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and in addition to permit the employment of temporary personnel to replace regular Public Health Service personnel detailed to those areas, to reimburse the Public Health Service for expenditures from its appropriations, and to replace supplies and equipment furnished from stocks.

The recent disastrous winter floods have affected a total of 177 counties in 11 different States. The population of these flood-stricken areas is 7,746,984. Preliminary reports show that the homes of 1,205,265 persons were flooded, 740,229 had to be cared for by the Red Cross and other agencies, 23,783 homes were seriously or completely destroyed, and 117 public water supplies servicing 1,617,000 persons were put out of operation. Floods occurring in winter precipitate particularly menacing health and sanitation problems.

The immediate emergency of health and sanitation in the first 30 days has been met by State and local agencies in cooperation with the United States Public Health Service. An allotment of $245,000 made to the latter service from emergency funds will be exhausted by March 1.

The committee was advised by Surgeon General Parran that conditions require prompt and continued application of modern health protective measures if costly illnesses and premature deaths are to be averted. He said: "I have no hesitation in saying that the cost of prevention will be far less than the consequences of neglect." The purpose of the joint resolution is to care for the rehabilitation situation that now presents itself in these areas.

Many of the communities suffering from the flood will undoubtedly require outside assistance other than that which State and local sources can furnish. Some communities will be without resources for health or other purposes. The Surgeon General states it will be advisable to set up a complete health service to operate during this rehabilitation period in some of the areas and in others it will be necessary to supplement existing services that are reasonably sufficient in normal times but inadequate to handle emergency conditions.

The proposed plan under the joint resolution contemplates an average expenditure of $6,000 per county for each of the 177 counties during the next 6 months. It is the opinion of the Surgeon General that this aid should be provided through grants by the Federal Government to the flooded States on the basis of relative needs under the general plan in effect as to regular grants under the provisions of the Social Security Act. The grant method is recommended by the Surgeon General in the belief that it will simplify administration of health and sanitation activities. Expenditure of funds would be through State and local organizations under Federal supervision and regulation. If the assistance were to be undertaken by direct employment of personnel by the Federal agency there would be the complication of two agencies, Federal and State or local, in the same areas striving for the same ends in varying degrees, but each under different operating conditions.

A clause is included in this joint resolution to make it clear that allocations of these funds for the purposes of the joint resolution shall be in addition to those which may otherwise be made under the Emergency Relief Act of 1936, as supplemented, and shall not be considered as excluding other allocations which may lawfully be made to the Public Health Service under the terms of that act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I merely desire to add to what has been said that this is an emergency appropriation. It is essential that the funds carried in the joint resolution be made available as soon as practicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 229) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 79 will be indefinitely postponed.

AUTHORITY TO SIGN HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 229

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess or adjournment of the Senate to follow today's session, the Vice President be authorized to sign House Joint Resolution 229.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a few moments ago I stated that, in all probability, an opportunity for consideration of bills on the calendar would be afforded on Monday. It is recalled that Monday will be a holiday in commemoration of the birth of President George Washington, and on second thought I desire to withdraw the announcement I made, and to say that unless something of an emergency character shall be brought before the Senate, it is not expected that business will be transacted following the reading of the Farewell Address by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. In the early future, at the next session following the meeting on Monday, the opportunity will be afforded to consider bills on the calendar.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the Senator able to say whether the reciprocal trade treaty bill will probably come before the Senate Tuesday?

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is in charge of the bill, that he expects to bring it forward in the very early future. Probably he will ask for its consideration next Tuesday.

COLLECTION OF STATE TAXES—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL DISTRICT COURTS

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, on the 17th of the present month I introduced a very short bill, to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code. The proposed amendment would affect the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States over suits relating to the collection of State taxes.

In view of the fact that the jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts has been under discussion during the last few days, I think this a proper time to bring the bill forward, and I hope that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate will give it the attention I think it merits.

I introduced the bill primarily because it affects my own State, but I dare say that almost to the degree it would affect my State, it would affect the States of other Senators. The purpose of the bill is to take away the jurisdiction of Federal district courts to enjoin, suspend, or restrain the assessment or collection of any tax imposed by or pursuant to the laws of any State. Provision is made that the bill is not to affect suits pending at the time of its enactment.

I digress to call attention to the fact that even if this bill shall be enacted it will not affect the litigation now under way in the courts in my State, or in the courts in any other State.

At this point I ask unanimous consent that the bill to which I refer, Senate bill 1551, be inserted in my remarks, so that those who read them may know the nature of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to the collection of State taxes

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, no district court shall have jurisdiction of any suit to enjoin, suspend, or restrain the assessment, levy, or collection of any tax imposed by or pursuant to the laws of any State where a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy may be had at law or in equity in the courts of such State."

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall not affect suits commenced in the district courts, either originally or by removal, prior to its passage; and all such suits shall be continued, proceedings therein had, appeals therein taken, and judgments therein rendered, in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

EXAMPLES OF SIMILAR LEGISLATION

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the proposed legislation is not novel in character.

Section 3224 of the Revised Statutes provides that "No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court." This provision applies only to taxes levied by the Federal Government. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575.

An act of March 4, 1927, provides that "No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed by the laws of Puerto Rico shall be maintained in the district court of the United States for Puerto Rico."

The Johnson Act of May 14, 1934, after which this bill is modeled, provides that—no district court shall have jurisdiction of any suit to enjoin, suspend, or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order of an administrative board or commission of a State, or any rate-making body of any political subdivision thereof, or to enjoin, suspend, or restrain any action in compliance with any such order, where jurisdiction is based solely upon the ground of diversity of citizenship, or the repugnance of such order to the Constitution of the United States, where such order (1) affects rates chargeable by a public utility, (2) does not interfere with interstate commerce, and (3) has been made after reasonable notice and hearing, and where a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy may be had at law or in equity in the courts of such State.

Most of the arguments which were used in support of the Johnson Act and brought about its enactment apply in like manner to the legislation now proposed.

NECESSITY FOR THE LEGISLATION

The existing practice of the Federal courts to entertain tax-injunction suits make it possible for foreign corporations to withhold from a State and its governmental subdivisions taxes in such vast amounts and for such long periods as to disrupt State and county finances, and thus make it possible for such corporations to determine for themselves the amount of taxes they will pay.

While this situation exists in many of the States, the detailed information presented herewith relates only to the State of Washington.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to read brief excerpts from a letter to me from an assistant attorney general of the State of Washington dealing with this particular matter and referring to a very important piece of litigation in my own State at this time. The writer of this letter is Mr. R. G. Sharpe, assistant attorney general of my State, who says:

(1) The statutes of Washington (ch. 61, Laws of 1931), takes away from the State courts the right to enjoin the collection of State and county taxes, unless the tax law is invalid or the property is exempt from taxation, and provides that taxpayers can contest their taxes only in refund actions after payment under protest. This law makes it possible for the State and its various agencies to survive while long drawn out tax litigation is in progress. But if those to whom the Federal courts are open may secure injunctive relief against offensive taxes, we have presented the highly unfair situation of the ordinary citizen being required to pay first and then litigate, while those privileged to sue in the Federal courts need pay only what they choose and withhold the balance during years of litigation.

Pending and past tax injunction suits maintained in the Federal courts of this State serve to emphasize the point last urged. Thus, in December 1936 the Northern Pacific Railway Co. instituted in the Federal District Court at Spokane a suit to restrain a portion of the taxes levied upon that company's operating property located in 23 counties of this State for the years 1935 and 1936. The tax for 1935 is $1,401,549, of which the company has refused to pay and seeks to restrain the collection of $618,087. The tax for 1936 is $1,343,460, of which the company has refused to pay and seeks to restrain the collection of $856,495. Thus, for these 2 years the company is seeking to enjoin the collection of $1,474,582, or more than half of its taxes. From the history of past similar litigation it is quite apparent that the company will refuse to pay any of these unpaid taxes until the end of the litigation, several years hence, and will likewise prosecute similar actions against the counties for the taxes for future years and will likewise withhold large proportions of its taxes for these later years. And it is likewise more than likely that other roads will institute similar suits and follow the same practice.

In this, history will but repeat itself, as shown by the records of the same Federal district court in similar suits begun 10 years ago. In the fall of 1926 and the beginning of 1927 the Northern Pacific and the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific Railroad (the "Milwaukee") instituted suits in the Federal court at Spokane to restrain the collection of their taxes, the N. P. for its 1925 and 1926 taxes, and the Milwaukee for its 1926 and 1927 taxes. Each year thereafter similar suits were instituted by the two companies, so that by the time decrees in the original suits were entered by the district court in September 1932 suits involving the N. P. taxes for 1926 to 1931 were pending, and suits involving the Milwaukee taxes for 1926 to 1931 were likewise pending. Later suits involving the 1932 N. P. taxes and the 1932 and 1933 Milwaukee taxes were instituted.

The 1925 and 1926 N. P. suit and the 1926 and 1927 Milwaukee suit took a year and a half to try, the trial being had before a special master, and, although every effort was made by the county defendants to press the suits to judgment, decrees were not entered in those suits, as I have said, until September 1932. By this time the counties were so hard-pressed for money by reason of these railroads withholding such a large proportion of their taxes, that the railroads, the N. P. and the S. P. & S. (another litigating road), were in a position to dictate the terms of settlement, and as a result the counties threw up their hands and by agreed decrees entered February 20, 1933, consented to a settlement of the N. P. suits, which settlements resulted in the counties receiving substantially $1,500,000 less in taxes for the years 1927 to 1932 than they would have received under the formula of valuation announced by Judge Webster in his decision of the 1925 and 1926 case. (See N. P. Ry. v. Adams County, 1 Fed. Supp. 163.)

The Milwaukee's offer of settlement was too ridiculous to be stomached by the counties, even in their distressed financial condition, and an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, resulting in a reversal of the 1926 and 1927 Milwaukee tax decree, in July 1934. (See C. M. St. P. & P. R. Co. v. Adams Co., 72 Fed. (2d) 816.) The tax commission thereupon made assessments of the Milwaukee property for the years 1926 to 1932, and on November 30, 1934, the Milwaukee elected to pay the taxes as so reassessed, on the 10-year installment plan. In neither the N. P. nor the Milwaukee settlement was any interest allowed on the taxes wrongfully withheld for all these years.

I am enclosing herewith a few rather startling figures with respect to these suits. In so doing, however, I have ignored the N. P. suit relating to the 1925 and 1926 taxes for the reason that the N. P., in March 1927, paid substantially all of its taxes for those 2 years, pursuant to stipulation that a judgment of refund might be entered for the excess taxes found, if any.

May I here restate a few of the figures shown by this statement:

Total taxes assessed against N. P., 1927 to 1931, and against Milwaukee, 1926 to 1932		$22,349,469
Total of said taxes paid by said companies prior to suit		12,893,713
Total of said taxes canceled as result of Milwaukee reassessment and settlements to which counties were forced to accede	$3,576,242
Total of said taxes wrongfully withheld and paid to counties (without interest) by N. P. on Feb. 20, 1933, and by Milwaukee on Nov. 30, 1934	5,879,514
		9,455,756
Interest to which counties would have been entitled at legal rate of 6 percent on said taxes wrongfully withheld for varying periods, some as long as 7½ years		1,120,774
Interest to which counties would have been entitled on said taxes wrongfully withheld as penalty for nonpayment of delinquent taxes		1,867,956

The suit of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. now pending in Washington serves to indicate the methods used by these powerful corporations to harass the State and local governments. The attorneys for the plaintiff very astutely did not make the State or the State tax commission parties to the action, but sued the 23 counties of the State in which the railway has property collectively, the purpose being to compel the defense of the action to be handled by 23 local prosecuting attorneys who may not be familiar with the processes by which utilities are valued and assessed by the State tax commission, and who may not be experts in the field of Federal court practice.

Perhaps it should be emphasized at this point that the bill does not take away any equitable right of a taxpayer, or deprive him of a day in court. Specific provision is made that the suit will be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Federal court only if a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy may be had at law or in equity in the courts of the State. Thus a full hearing and judicial determination of the controversy is assured.

At present the foreign corporation has a choice of going into two tribunals. The advantage thus given is illustrated by the following quotation from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the Johnson Act:

Indeed, the utility company may pursue these two remedies concurrently. The Supreme Court of the United States had held that State and Federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction in such cases and a utility company can proceed in both State and Federal courts until a final judgment is rendered in one of the two proceedings. This gives the utility an opportunity, as the case progresses, to ascertain the views of the State authorities and the Federal authorities and, when it once ascertains these views, and finds it will probably be defeated in one of the proceedings, it can dismiss the case in that proceeding and rely upon the other. It seems quite plain that to give the utility this advantage is unreasonable and unfair. It is likewise exceedingly expensive and always means long delay. All the expenses in the end must be borne by the people who pay the rates to the public utility company. It all comes out of the ultimate consumer.

The following quotations from the same report are also thought to be applicable to this bill in the same manner that they were applicable to the Johnson bill:

LITIGATION IN FEDERAL COURTS MORE EXPENSIVE THAN IN STATE COURTS

It is much more expensive to litigate in Federal courts than in State courts. Attorney fees are usually higher, and the other expenses connected with the litigation are, as a rule, many times higher in Federal court than in the State court. The wealthy individual or corporation is thus often enabled to wear out his opponent and compel him to settle or submit to an unjust judgment for the very reason that his opponent is not financially able to follow him through the tortuous and expensive route through the Federal court to the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington. And all the time in this dispute there is no Federal question involved. There is a dispute arising under a State statute or law of other origin and nothing more. There are many places in the United States where litigants must travel several hundred miles to attend the place of trial if they are sued in Federal court.

It is not argued that the Federal court will be unjust. For the purpose of our illustration we can assume that the Federal court will be just as fair and as just as the State court. But when sued in a Federal court, the defendant will be required to take his attorneys and his witnesses long distances where the Federal court sits. If the case is continued, they must come again. And when the case is finally decided, the poor defendant may be successful, but his opponent, because he is a nonresident, has taken him into Federal court and he appeals the case to the Federal court of appeals. Then he must send his attorneys several hundred miles to the place where the Federal court of appeals sits. This means again a very much increased expense and, in almost every case, a much larger attorney fee. He may win his case in the court of appeals, but, if so, his opponent may possibly take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States and he will have to send his attorneys perhaps a thousand or 2,000 miles, paying the expenses and again a much larger attorney fee than he would pay in the State courts.

It means, therefore, that a person taken against his will into the Federal court for the purpose of settling a State question is worn out before he reaches the end. He is financially unable to follow the case to the end. Therefore, at the beginning, he perhaps submits to an injustice because he knows it means financial ruin to pursue the case to its final determination.

It is easy to be seen, therefore, that while perhaps there was some basis for this kind of a law when our Constitution was adopted, the purpose for which this provision of law is now used was never dreamed of by our forefathers when they adopted the Constitution. The effect of this provision of law is now entirely different from what it was then. First adopted to bring about justice, it has, as a matter of practice, very largely resulted in injustice and discrimination. Originally intended for the protection of the nonresident, it has become a weapon of destruction and injustice in his hands.

Those who favor the continuance of this unjust discrimination base their reason upon the original claim of jealousies existing between citizens of different States. But the real reason is that they want to protect the "privilege" which this law gives them. They desire to have the right in their litigation to choose between two tribunals. What was originally intended to protect them in a right has become a "privilege" which they use to give them an advantage over their adversaries.

RELIEF OF FEDERAL COURTS FROM CONGESTION

The congestion in our Federal district courts is acknowledged by all. That of itself is often a denial of justice. All classes of our citizens have recently become interested in various proposals for the relief of the congestion in our Federal district courts. The President of the United States has sent official messages to Congress on the subject. He has appointed a commission composed of eminent jurists and other able, patriotic scholars. The question has received the attention of the leading members of the bar throughout the entire country. Federal judges from the Supreme Court down have lent their assistance in trying to devise some plan by which the Federal courts can be relieved from a large amount of the work now upon Federal judicial dockets.

Why not do this by letting State courts settle State controversies and confine Federal courts to the settlement of Federal questions? When a State question arises under a State statute, why not let the courts of that State settle that controversy, whether the controversy is between citizens of one State or citizens of two different States? Why not be logical and let the State courts try controversies arising under State laws within their borders instead of permitting a few privileged persons who do business in a State to take their controversies into Federal courts and thus burden Federal judges with the settlement of State questions and the control of lawsuits arising entirely and solely out of controversies under State laws?

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

While there are many other parts of the committee's report on the Johnson Act which are well worth rereading in connection with the consideration of the proposed legislation, there is presented here only one additional quotation, which deals with the constitutional power of the Congress to enact legislation of this type:

The object of the legislation, as it has been distinctly stated, is to take away jurisdiction from the district courts of the United States. It is not intended to take away and does not take away any jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court is the only court where jurisdiction is conferred by the Constitution. All the inferior courts—which means all the courts of the United States except the Supreme Court—obtain their jurisdiction from statute. It would be perfectly constitutional for Congress to pass an act which would abolish every Federal court in existence except the Supreme Court. All the jurisdiction which such inferior courts have has been conferred upon them by statute, and the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that it is within the power of Congress to add to that jurisdiction within the limits of the Constitution, and to take away any part or all of it.

In the case of Kline v. Burke Construction Co. (260 U. S. 226 (1922)) the Supreme Court said:

"The right of a litigant to maintain an action in the Federal court on the ground that there is a controversy between citizens of different States is not one derived from the Constitution of the United States, unless in a very indirect sense. Certainly it is not a right granted by the Constitution. The applicable provisions, so far as necessary to be quoted here, are contained in article III. Section 1 of that article provides: 'The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.' By section 2 of the same article it is provided that the judicial power shall extend to certain designated cases and controversies, and, among them 'to controversies * * * between citizens of different States * * *.' The effect of these provisions is not to vest jurisdiction in the inferior courts over the designated cases and controversies, but to delimit those in respect of which Congress may confer jurisdiction upon such courts as it creates. Only the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is derived directly from the Constitution. Every other court created by the General Government derives its jurisdiction wholly from the authority of Congress. That body may give, withhold, or restrict such jurisdiction at its discretion, provided it be not extended beyond the boundaries fixed by the Constitution."

This question was passed upon directly by the Supreme Court in an early day. In Turner v. Bank of America (4 Dall. 8, 10 (U. S. 1799)) the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Chase, said:

"The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derived their judicial power immediately from the Constitution; but the political truth is, that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this Court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us, or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would, perhaps, be inexpedient, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject, in every form, which the Constitution might warrant."

It is perfectly clear that this bill cannot be successfully attacked on constitutional grounds. Congress, in legislating on that subject, has always acted on that theory.

Since the Johnson Act was passed, its constitutionality has been upheld in an opinion by a United States district court in Mississippi, which reviewed at length the constitutional basis for such legislation in the case of Mississippi Power & Light Co. v. City of Jackson (9 Fed. Supp. 564).

Mr. President, in conclusion I desire to ask of my brethren a careful consideration of this particular bill, not because it affects my State only, but because the problem raised by reason of the holding that litigants have a right to go into the Federal court and seek relief against the imposition of taxes, as in the State of Washington, is one that confronts every State in the Union. It is a problem which is challenging to every State in the Union which has tax problems confronting it.

I sincerely hope that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate will see fit to report this bill promptly. I think my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] wrote a portion of the committee's report from which I have quoted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN of Michigan in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting the nomination of Murray W. Latimer, of New York, to be a member of the Social Security Board for the remainder of the term expiring August 13, 1941, vice John G. Winant, which was referred to the Committee on Finance; and also a message withdrawing the nomination of John G. Winant, of New Hampshire, to be a member of the Social Security Board for the remainder of the term expiring August 13, 1941 (which was sent to the Senate Jan. 8, 1937), which was ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the nomination of David R. Kennicott, of Illinois, to be State director of the Public Works Administration in Illinois.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Paul V. McNutt, of Indiana, to be United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DUFFY, from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, reported favorably the nomination of Col. Clarence S. Ridley, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for appointment as Governor of the Panama Canal, as provided by law, vice Col. Julian L. Schley, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, resigned.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Col. Raymond Franklin Metcalfe, Medical Corps, to be assistant to the Surgeon General, with the rank of brigadier general, Regular Army, for a period of 4 years from date of acceptance, with rank from March 1, 1937, vice Brig. Gen. M. A. W. Shockley, assistant to the Surgeon General, to be retired February 28, 1937.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Reginald S. Castleman, of California, to be Secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stanford C. Stiles to be United States marshal, eastern district of Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Stiles to be United States marshal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John M. Carmody, of New York, to be Administrator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there are reasons why the President should be notified immediately of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Carmody, and I make the request that he be notified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was unable to hear the suggestion of the Senator from New York as to this nomination.

Mr. COPELAND. I asked that the President be notified immediately of the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I was going to make the same request, and I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York that the President be notified of the confirmation? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

NOMINATION IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frederick LeRoy Martin to be brigadier general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CHIEF OF INFANTRY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George Arthur Lynch to be Chief of Infantry, with the rank of major general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination of General Lynch.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL NOMINATIONS IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

NATIONAL GUARD

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Elmer Stoddard to be brigadier general, Adjutant General's Department, National Guard of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That concludes the Executive Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 22, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate February 19, 1937

MEMBER, SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD

Murray W. Latimer, of New York, to be a member of the Social Security Board for the remainder of the term expiring August 13, 1941, vice John G. Winant.

CONFIRMATIONS

RHODE ISLAND

Arnold Sherman Knowles, Jr., Kingston.

WITHDRAWAL

Executive nomination withdrawn from the Senate February 19, 1937

MEMBER, SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD

John G. Winant, of New Hampshire, to be a member of the Social Security Board for the remainder of the term expiring August 13, 1941, which was sent to the Senate January 8, 1937.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord and father of us all, we pray that the footfall of the Master may pass this way. It was He who opened the way into the bosom of the Father, revealing His gentleness, mercy, and love. May we be faithful to the requirements of our calling by heeding the words: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Be Thou unto us one whom we delight to serve. Cleanse our minds from prejudice and confirm us in trust as against all fear. Bless all schools and all instruments of education and let their light be diffused throughout our whole country. Look with divine favor upon all churches and all institutions of beneficence. May our fellow men come to the knowledge of the revelation of the truth as it is in the teaching of the Man of Galilee. May there be peace and happiness in all the earth, and Thine shall be the praise. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4064) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. STEIWER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 148) entitled "An act to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. BLACK, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. WALSH, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Res. 229. Joint resolution to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods.

SANITATION ACTIVITIES IN AREAS STRICKEN BY FLOODS

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, it is expected that the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 229) to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods, which we passed yesterday, will pass the other body today.

I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to accept the message from the Senate if it comes over while the House is not in session and that the Speaker be permitted to sign the joint resolution while the House is not in session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the Clerk of the House may be authorized to receive the message from the Senate with respect to House Joint Resolution 229 after the adjournment of the House and that the Speaker be authorized to sign the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES DELAWARE VALLEY TERCENTENARY COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Resolution 102, Seventy-fourth Congress, the Chair appoints to fill the vacancy on the United States Delaware Valley Tercentenary Commission, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. ALLEN].

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4720, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations hereinafter made for the field service of the Post Office Department, except as otherwise provided, shall not be expended for any of the purposes hereinbefore provided for on account of the Post Office Deartment in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the actual and necessary expenses of officials and employees of the Post Office Department and Postal Service, when traveling on official business, may continue to be paid from the appropriations for the service in connection with which the travel is performed, and appropriations for the fiscal year 1938 of the character heretofore used for such purposes shall be available therefor: Provided further, That appropriations hereinafter made, except such as are exclusively for payment of compensation, shall be immediately available for expenses in connection with the examination of estimates for appropriations in the field including per-diem allowances in lieu of actual expenses of subsistence.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 51, line 11, strike out "$216,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$223,320."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that item has been passed in the reading of the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold the point of order? I have been trying to follow the reading of the paragraphs and I have three or four different amendments and amendment no. 1 comes at page 51, and the others will come at other parts of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, what I am trying to do by these amendments is this. There are three or four different amendments at different pages.

The Budget asked for 45 inspectors in the Post Office Department, and the Appropriations Committee provided for 5 inspectors.

The Inspection Service of the United States Post Office Department is very similar to the organization of the G-men in the Department of Justice, and recently we provided 200 additional investigators for the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, and these post-office inspectors, like they say of the Canadian Northwest Mounted, always get their man. They are supposed to go on throughout the years chasing up postal robbers and investigating everything in connection with the efficiency of the Post Office Department. They are very valuable men to the country.

When the Budget, with the approval of the President, asks for 45 inspectors, I would not say that I would expect the Appropriations Committee to give them the entire 45, but it seems to me that cutting them down to 5 is a very big cut, and I would like to see some compromise reached to bring the number up to 25.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The biggest part of the work in which they say they are behind, relates to following up the post express statute, where they have instances of violations where the Government, by reason of curtailment of transportation, has cut out a lot of service and people in various towns, if they want to get their documents into certain places at a particular time, are obliged to hire some messenger to carry them there, because the Government does not furnish any such service itself. They want to follow up these people where they pay a messenger in such cases and do not pay any postage on the letters. This was too much. This is the kind of work as to which they are so far behind, having to do with complaints of violations. Their regular work is not very far behind.

Mr. CONNERY. They have investigations of post offices, post-office sites, and some of these men have not had a furlough for 3 or 4 years and have not had their time off. They are called up just like the G-men. They go home for a day to start a furlough and they are called back immediately and do not get any furlough.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. RICH. The post-office inspectors have made investigations of shortages in accounts in my district, in Potter County, and they found there are shortages in the accounts, but they have not gone ahead and prosecuted the people responsible for those shortages. Why do they not do it?

Mr. CONNERY. That is not up to the inspectors. The inspectors turn over their reports and then the Post Office Department or the Department of Justice takes action.

Mr. RICH. It is up to the Post Office Department, but it has not taken any action.

Mr. CONNERY. That is not the fault of the inspectors. I am trying to get a decent break for these inspectors, who do not even get overtime when they work overtime.

Mr. RICH. The inspectors have made their report and the Post Office Department has not gone ahead with the prosecution.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman. I have followed the work of the inspectors and I think it is very arduous and their service is very fine. I have sent a good many matters for inspection to them. They have done good work, and I know that they work many hours without rest at all. They are overworked at the present time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that on page 56 of the bill there is an additional $20,000 placed at the discretion of the Postmaster General for the purpose of examining into the violations of postal laws; so if the gentleman has in mind matters of substantive violations, the additional $20,000 has been provided for that purpose.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not mean that. The Budget asked the approval of the President for 45 additional inspectors, and the committee has granted only 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. The Budget asked for 45 new inspectors, and if the Appropriations Committee had come in with 25 and said that they would cut us down to 25, that would be something, but they cut it down to 5 after the President and the Budget admitted that the Post Office Department needs 45; it seems to me too much of a cut.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman is addressing himself to the proposed increase in the number of inspectors.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. We have been very liberal in building up the force of post-office inspectors. During the fiscal year 1936 Congress provided 15 additional inspectors in charge of divisions, and 580 inspectors. Congress provided 15 additional inspectors, and in the current law provision was made for 35 more, making a total added to the force in the past 2 years of 50 men, and with the 5 additional in this bill the augmentation of the force in 3 years will have been 55. That is a pretty liberal increase in their force, and they are high-salaried people, and that imposes a very heavy permanent personnel charge on the Treasury of the United States. The field of service of the post-office inspectors undoubtedly is as wide as all outdoors. There are many things that they can do. Perhaps some sort of justification could be made for a thousand inspectors, but where are we ever going to end on the proposition? There is a very large force of inspectors at the present time, and we have augmented it 55 in the last 2 years. We think that we have provided all the inspectors needed. In view of the state of the Nation's finances and the enormous drain on the Treasury otherwise, we think we have given all that good practice should give, and they can get along very well. They can perform useful service with the force they have now. We do not feel under all the circumstances that any more should be allowed at the present time, without any prejudice whatever to what may be justified in the future.

Mr. CONNERY. What puzzles me is when the United States Post Office Department goes to the Budget and tells the Budget what they need, and then the Budget comes down here and they come to you, and you cut them down.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has not stated in toto what the Post Office Department wants. They wanted 100 additional inspectors. They want any number, but that is no reason why they should be granted.

Mr. CONNERY. The Budget cuts them down, and then the Budget, with the approval of the President, says 45 are needed, and the man from the Post Office Department who appears before the Committee on Appropriations is not permitted to tell even what the needs of his Department are. He must stand for the Budget estimate.

Mr. LUDLOW. Further, since 1934 in the augmentation of this service we have imposed a fixed annual charge of $400,000 on the United States Treasury. Are we to go on and on and increase this force when it is not necessary?

Mr. CONNERY. They think it is necessary. Will the gentleman withdraw his point of order and let us have a vote?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have no disposition in the world to hold the gentleman off. I am very glad to assist him in any proposition that he has before the House, and I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman. will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. In order that we may have the figures before us before we take a vote, let me say that the Post Office Department requested a number of additional inspectors from the Budget.

I do not know whether they requested 100 or not, but I will assume that they did. Everybody knows that the rapid growth of the service and the assumption on the part of the Department of such extraneous activities as Social Security and payment of the soldiers' bonus, and so forth, required additional appropriations. The Budget, however, after thoroughly considering the matter, recommended an appropriation which would permit of the appointment of 45 additional inspectors.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. The committee reduced that amount so that the Department will only be able to appoint five additional inspectors to take care of these tremendously increasing activities of the Government. It is the opinion of the Department and of the Budget that that is too meager for present-day needs.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. May I ask the able gentleman from New York how far he thinks we ought to go in filling up this costly additional personnel in the inspection service? How many inspectors does the gentleman think we ought to have?

Mr. MEAD. I would say they needed a sufficient inspection force to insure expeditious delivery of the mail, to protect the patrons of the Service, and to see to it that the Service is mobilized and systematized so that it will render every increasing and improved service to the people of the country. Five inspectors, in my judgment, is a very meager allowance.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is five additional inspectors, the gentleman will note. We already have a very large inspection force.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; and we have a very large postal force; but that is no reason why we should not have a larger one.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has spoken in very general terms. In what respect can the gentleman advise us that the mails are not being protected at this time?

Mr. MEAD. I can say to the gentleman that when the Chief Inspector requests the appointment of 100 additional inspectors it is evidence that he needs them for his work. He knows his needs.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order at this point in the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offered my amendment to page 50.

The CHAIRMAN. Having passed the paragraph to which the amendment is offered, the amendment is not in order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIELD SERVICE, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

Rewards to postal employees for inventions: The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay a cash reward for any invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions for an improvement or economy in device, design, or process applicable to the Postal Service submitted by one or more employees of the Post Office Department or the Postal Service which shall be adopted for use and will clearly effect a material economy or increase efficiency, and for that purpose the sum of $200 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the sums so paid to employees in accordance with this Act shall be in addition to their usual compensation: Provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this appropriation until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to line 24, on page 53, where it is stated that the sum of $200 is appropriated for the purpose mentioned. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed that the purpose mentioned is to reward postal employees for inventions they may have made and assigned to the United States Government, thereby, I suppose, helping the Postal Service.

By reference to page 95 of the hearings we see that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] has very properly questioned this amount of money; and we see that the answer has been that it is well for the psychological effect to include this $200. We see also from the report of the hearing that in 1931 we spent $1,450 and in 1932, $1,000.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that $200 is entirely inadequate for the purpose mentioned. If a man invents anything, it will cost him almost $200 to perfect the invention and patent it; and certainly he is not going to divulge it to any of his mates, or anybody else, until it is thoroughly protected. I question whether $200 is sufficient for the entire Postal Service.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman is aware, no doubt, that there have been no expenditures at all under this head since 1932.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes; I am aware of that; and I feel that the reason there have been no expenditures has been because the amount is entirely inadequate.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. I may say that for a great many years any man who has patented anything and assigned it to the Post Office Department has received nothing but a letter of commendation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think he should have received more. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this amount should be raised to $4,000, at least. I believe, furthermore, that it should be specifically stated in the law that this award is available to employees of the Postal Department. It should be specifically stated in the law that a notice of this possible award and reward shall be posted in every post office of the United States, thereby encouraging invention among postal employees.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has not consulted the administrative officials of the Postal Service in regard to this matter, has he?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No; I have not.

Mr. LUDLOW. He will find that they do not see any necessity for such amount as the gentleman suggests; in fact, they do not find any way to spend the very limited amount of $200.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is exactly my point—if the amount were adequate and notice of its existence were posted in the various post offices, it would stimulate invention among the employees of the Postal Service.

Mr. LUDLOW. Does not the gentleman think that perhaps the best judge of the necessity or desirability of an appropriation of this kind is the postal officials, who are in touch with the Postal Service and know all about it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Theoretically I think the gentleman is right, but I realize very often business officials get into a rut.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the chairman of the subcommittee a moment ago say that the very best authorities on subjects of this kind are to be found in the Post Office Department; and if we follow their advice, I assume from what he said, we will be at least conducting the Postal Service in an efficient manner.

May I say I will not ask for anything today that has not been recommended by that expert authority he just mentioned. I do want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the policy adopted in the last few years, both by the Budget and our Appropriations Committee, does not indicate we are coping in a wise and businesslike manner with the ever-increasing volume of mail coming into the Postal Service. The postal employees are not looking for an increased appropriation for salaries, nor are they looking for any betterment of existing conditions. However, I do want to appeal to the Members of the House to reverse the policy we have adopted during the last 2 or 3 years, so that the service of this Department will be increased and additional service may be given to the people of this country.

We have instituted no village carrier service in the last 4 or 5 years. We have steadily turned down applications for extension of rural services and requests for new rural routes.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I want to make my statement first; then I shall be glad to yield if I can secure additional time.

These services, whether they be village delivery, rural delivery, or air mail, have been reduced, diminished, or postponed as a result of this policy. In order to get my story before you quickly and in general terms, may I ask you to look at the record.

In 1933 the gross revenue of the Department amounted to $587,000,000. The estimated number of pieces handled by the Department that year was a little less than 20,000,000,000. The appropriation for that year was $805,000,000. Now, then, the gross revenue of 1936, compared with 1933, rose from $587,000,000 to $665,000,000. The estimated number of pieces handled increased from 19,868,000,000 in 1933 to 23,571,000,000 in 1936; the appropriation was cut from $805,000,000 to $728,000,000.

How can you do more business and increase and extend the service where it is warranted and at the same time cut, cut, and cut the allotments?

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I refuse to yield.

Mr. Chairman, under the present system the Department officials may go to the Budget, but beyond that their power is limited. They cannot appeal to us over and above the authority of the Budget. The evidence presented to the committee by Department heads reveals that such is the case.

What is the situation this year? We find that the committee has reduced a number of estimates below the Budget figures and below the request of the Department. When the chairman of the subcommittee said to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut that we can get expert advice in that Department, he stated a truism. I agree with him, but it is high time that we follow that expert advice given to us by the Department officials.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may present my whole story, I ask unanimous consent to continue for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman said it is a truism that we can get expert advice from the Post Office Department. The gentleman made quite a point of the fact that additional village service was being established. That being a truism, I want to quote what the Post Office Department has to say on that.

Mr. MEAD. Please do not take all of my time.

Mr. LUDLOW. I quote the following from the hearings before our subcommittee:

Mr. LUDLOW. The Post Office Department has no plans for the establishment of additional village delivery service, has it?

Mr. DONALDSON. We do not want to establish it.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that if any Member of Congress has a village in his district where the people in their own judgment and opinion are entitled to village delivery service, it is the duty of the Congress to provide for it. The Department is not extending any service simply because they have to pinch and borrow from one bureau to another in order to make ends meet. They cannot continue to do this with safety, and at the same time give expeditious service.

You will find that last year's appropriation bill for the Post Office Department amounted to $780,584,589; this year's bill amounts to $782,469,361, an increase of $1,184,772. But the Budget approved an appropriation of $785,744,478, or $3,275,117 more than the committee has allowed. The Department asked the Budget for all that and more. The Postal Service needs more money. Take, for instance, the Railway Mail Service. It has been so curtailed that the workroom in the railway mail cars is overcrowded. Ordinarily the car is left free, so far as doors, aisles, and washrooms are concerned, for the men to work in safety. Today the cars are piled high with mail, so that if you go over and ask a railway mail clerk to take a letter he cannot open the door because the car is crowded to the ceiling with mail. If he opens the other door he will have to hold the bags back in order to keep them from falling over while he takes your letter.

The mail is being delayed today. A postmaster in North Carolina told me that he is going to increase his revenues by two hundred to three hundred thousand dollars a year because a firm located in Baltimore is going to take its mail to a North Carolina city in order to avoid the delays in the Postal Service.

Mr. Chairman, if you will consider the increased revenue, the increased number of pieces handled by this Department every year, and then give the Department the amount of money indicated by a fair comparison in order to do the increased amount of work, we will have the greatest Postal Service in the world. We know now, even though they are working under a very severe handicap, they are doing their level best to carry out the rich traditions of this Department; but the appropriations requested by the Department are being continually cut.

I am not asking for much money, but I believe the Postal Service ought to have enough to give real service to the people of America. Why, I myself some few months ago mailed a number of letters to constituents in my district urging them to meet me at a given point at a designated time. Those letters left here in plenty of time to reach my constituents, and yet they were 3 days late at four out of five offices in reaching their destination. I find that such conditions are due entirely to inadequate appropriations in the various bureaus of this Service. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

It is very interesting to hear the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads asking for increased appropriations in order to perfect the service of the Post Office Department.

Four years ago the President of the United States appointed a Postmaster General to put the Post Office Department on a business basis. The then Postmaster General decided the only way he could do that would be to increase the first-class postage rate 50 percent, and instead of having a 2-cent letter we have a 3-cent letter. From this we received additional revenue of over $100,000,000 a year, which the people of this country must pay. It was the thought that if we put 1 cent additional postage on the letters we would balance the budget in the Post Office Department and have fifty millions to the good, but we have had deficit after deficit during the last administration of the Postmaster General. Thanks to him, when he resigned last September we then had hopes of a balanced Post Office budget, but the results were and are still very disappointing. The receipts are still less than the expenditures.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield now.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. I wish my colleague would yield to me.

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield. I have only 5 minutes.

POST-OFFICE EXPENSES HIGHEST THEY HAVE EVER BEEN

Last year they were $88,000,000 in the "red" after they had received an additional $100,000,000 from the 3-cent postage. No wonder the old Postmaster General decided he did not want to cut off that 1 cent in revenue, because then we would have been $188,000,000 in the "red"; but, thank goodness, that Postmaster General resigned. His name was Jim Farley, of Manhattan, N. Y.

A NEW POSTMASTER GENERAL APPOINTED

The President has seen fit to appoint a new Postmaster General. His name is Hon. James Farley, of New York, N. Y. Now, I presume, we will get a balanced budget in the Post Office Department, and we are going to look forward to that; but I understand the same Postmaster General is going to continue to have 3-cent postage.

Well, he is a great fellow. You know the Democrats had a banquet for him in Washington the other day up at the Mayflower Hotel. [Applause.] There were many speeches at that evening's entertainment and they lauded him to the skies so much that I am afraid they will turn his head and he will not be able to do a good job in the Post Office Department. If he does not do a good job, I may say to you men who made speeches at the banquet, it is just going to be too bad for the Treasury Department of the United States, because they do not request the Post Office to pay expenses out of the revenues they receive; instead of that, the expenses go to the Treasury Department and Mr. Morgenthau has to foot the bill. Now, Mr. Morgenthau is going to have a mighty hard time footing the bills of the new Postmaster General, Mr. Farley, because Mr. Farley, I can see, is going to go into the red, and if the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads does not help Mr. Farley, they are going to be in mighty hot water down there before the end of the next fiscal year, because if they did not get the additional 1-cent postage which they want and which they are demanding that the people pay, you would be from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 in the red each year in the operation of the Post Office Department under this administration of Mr. Roosevelt and Farley.

It is a pretty serious state of affairs when the Post Office Department of this country receives such great revenues. It seems to me you ought to be conservative in your expenditures and you ought to make some recognition of the fact that this subcommittee has tried to give you a bill with the appropriations cut as far as they possibly could be cut, and I hope you will defeat any amendments proposing any increases at this particular time. I invite you men to read the statement of the Federal Treasury, showing the largest deficit in this country's history, and not only that you are at the present time spending more money for Government operation than any administration in the history of the Nation. You are going to shock the American people some of these days such as you have never shocked them before if you do not begin to economize in the operation of this Government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

I shall not take the usual amount of time, but I should like to answer my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who, I take it, is an experienced Member of this House.

For some years past, having covered the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to take this occasion to mention that we had a Postmaster General serving in 1932 by the name of Walter F. Brown, who advocated the additional 1-cent postage, and the Ways and Means Committee brought the bill before the House of Representatives, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and levied that additional 1 cent as a tax for the duration of the emergency, passed by the last session of the Seventy-second Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF CHIEF INSPECTOR

Salaries of inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions and 580 inspectors, $2,232,500.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 55, strike out lines 2, 3, and 4 and insert in lieu thereof:

"Salaries of inspectors: For salaries of post-office inspectors, $2,377,000."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, these different amendments are all along the same line. The entire cost is about $175,000 to put these 45 inspectors on the job, as recommended by the Budget and by the President. We heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who has lived with this subject, and he has told us that you cannot cut down the Budget estimates in the Post Office Department and get decent results from the post-office workers of the United States. I call attention to the post-office inspectors particularly, because their record back through the years of solving crime mysteries, in regard to the post-office robberies, and protecting the mail in the air, on the train, on the steamship, and inspecting post-office sites has been very valuable. They have saved millions and millions of dollars to the taxpayers of the United States by recovering stolen money, by getting information in respect to post-office sites, so that no one can put over anything on the Government, and when the site is picked the Government gets the best site at the least cost. Particularly, as the chairman of the Committee on Labor, I am interested in the fact that these men are not getting their time off. As I pointed out, they are like the G-men. The G-men are called in, and they get sent away for a day's vacation, they may be out for 3 hours, when they are called in again and told that they have to go to Milwaukee or Minneapolis or St. Paul or San Francisco on a kidnaping case. The post-office inspectors are in the same situation. They get a day off, and they are called back on some postal robbery or someone's defaulting with the funds of the United States Government, or the thousand and one things that come in through keeping up the efficiency of the Postal Service.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] also spoke about the expert advice of people from the Department appearing before the Committee on Appropriations. I do not think it is generally known, at least among the new Members of Congress, that an official of any department of the Government before the Committee on Appropriations is gagged. He is tongue-tied. He cannot say what his department needs. It is against the law, it is against the regulations for him to go before the Committee on Appropriations and say, "This is actually what we need." I never could understand for the life of me how that got into the law, that a Government official, when a committee of this House is supposed to get every bit of available information, when he comes before the Committee on Appropriations is not allowed to speak his mind, to tell the needs of his department.

The Post Office Department, for instance, tells the Budget what they think they need. The Budget cuts them down and says, "This is what we think you need." When that Post Office official goes before the Committee on Appropriations he is forbidden to ask for anything except what the Budget estimates call for. I am getting up to the point that when the President of the United States approves the Budget, and the Budget asks the Committee on Appropriations of this House to give them 45 inspectors in the Post Office Department, I cannot see how within reason, in order to keep up the efficiency of that Department, the committee can cut it down to 5. I know what it is to attempt to overturn the Committee on Appropriations. I know they are the watchdogs of the Treasury, but it seems to me at a time like this the chairman of this committee should offer some sort of a compromise and say, "If we cannot give you 45 inspectors for the Post Office Department, we will give you 25 or even 22." But to cut it down from 45 to 5 does not seem to me to be reasonable.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on page 45 of the committee report they show an item of interest on public debt of $860,000,000 for 1938, and $835,000,000 for 1937. That is an increase of $25,000,000 over 1 year in that fixed amount. Does the gentleman not think that we ought to go slow about increasing the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. You have a choice there of being penny wise and pound foolish, of destroying the morale and efficiency of your Government department, or cutting it down and cutting it down. The gentleman remembers what happened in the economy bill. We were going to take $300,000,000 away from the disabled veterans to protect the taxpayers of the United States—take it away from men many of whom served and were shot on the fields of France. Then we came along and we said that we were going to cut the salaries of the Government workers. They get $1,100 a year and we would cut them down to $800 a year, and we were going to cut the salaries of Members of Congress and cut everybody's salary, and we did, and within the period of 3 months the American people said, "Don't be so foolish. We don't want economy of that sort. We don't want efficiency impaired. We believe that people should get decent wages under decent conditions and that the Government should function properly as a Government."

Mr. MAY. I am just asking the gentleman to express his views on the subject of when we ought to stop some of this cost.

Mr. CONNERY. I am willing to go along with the Budget. The Budget and the President say they want 45 inspectors, and we may rest assured that when the Budget asks for 45 inspectors the chances are the Department needs 75.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. I am sure we should have in mind in considering appropriations for the Postal Service the fact that the Postal Service is one service that produces an approximate balance of its expenditures; in other words, the Postal Service receives revenue. It is not like the Army or the Navy, where all the appropriation is spent and no revenue is brought back into the Treasury.

Mr. CONNERY. Not only that, but from what I have been told the American people never have wanted to balance the budget of the Post Office Department; they say, "We want service."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. I feel I must challenge the statement of the distinguished Chairman of the Post Office Committee that the inspection service is a revenue-producing service.

Mr. MEAD. I did not say that.

Mr. CONNERY. He did not say that; he said the Post Office Department was a revenue-producing department.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman seems to base his very fervid argument for these additional inspectors on the ground that the Post Office Department wants them.

Mr. CONNERY. No; that is only one of the arguments. The President and the Bureau of the Budget wants them.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman tell us what specific part of the Postal Service needs them?

Mr. CONNERY. The whole Post Office Department.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is very general.

Mr. CONNERY. They are needed to catch train robbers who rob the United States mail.

Mr. LUDLOW. But all that work is being done now.

Mr. CONNERY. We have not done away with crime in the United States.

Mr. LUDLOW. We never will.

Mr. CONNERY. I hope that some day we will get away from crime, but a lot of additional inspectors are needed now and will be needed in the future.

Mr. LUDLOW. If we had 10,000 inspectors, we could not do away with crime.

Mr. CONNERY. But we could catch some of the criminals.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the House should face this question right now and adopt some philosophy as to what they are going to do toward economy and toward the efforts of its committees to effect economy.

It would be very pleasing to the chairman and to the members of our committee to allow every dime asked for and to make every effort to satisfy everyone as to this Post Office and Treasury Department bill; then we would receive the agreeable praises of those who were helped in getting a little bit more from the Government.

In order to be fair to the taxpayers and to the people we must, however, stop long enough to analyze the well-meant, plausible, and sympathetic appeals made by Members on this floor in the interest of special groups here and there. I know that I could take any section of this bill, either Treasury or Post Office, and speak dramatically about any item, justifying an increase. It would be very fine to be able to make that kind of speech. There is not an item in the bill that any member of the committee or I could not stand here and say should be larger; but somewhere, sometime, this House has to stop and say, "Here we economize." We must close our ears to sentimental appeals based on the betterment of the service. We must cut down somewhere.

May I say in passing, Mr. Chairman, that the trouble in America today is that our people want too much? It is time to cease to consider ourselves as a people who must have de luxe service, advantages, rewards, benefits, and all the other emoluments and perquisites that are labeled as belonging to American citizens. We must stop and ask ourselves where the money is coming from.

It is time for us in this House, even though the appeal may be sentimental, to analyze it and see whether the people of America cannot afford to deprive themselves of just a little service in order to save the taxpayers of the United States.

Now, with reference to this particular amendment, we have in the Postal Service 555 inspectors today. In the last 2 years we have added 55 inspectors. The Post Office Department says they want 47 more. Gentlemen, you do not need an Appropriations Committee if you are merely going to accept the recommendations of the Department—not only the Postal Service but other departments as well. We do not need to meet if we are going to give it to them because they say they want it. They want to do a beautiful job, of course. They want to make the service perfect; but your committee after a thorough study believes that the 55 inspectors given to them the last 2 years and the 5 inspectors we are allowing them in this bill should do the job. If the people of America have to stand the awful handicap of enduring less than perfect service, we shall begin to have more in the Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman yield at that point without disturbing the continuity of his thought?

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Supplementing the very able appeal the gentleman from Kentucky has made for economy, I wish to inject the fact that since 1930 we have added an annual increase to the inspection service of $441,045.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. I am glad to have those figures in the RECORD. May I say in closing, Mr. Chairman, that the Members should not be swayed by their sympathies. Be fair to the Government and to the taxpayers.

Let us teach the people of America that the old principle of denying ourselves something is still a good principle to follow. I believe if this Committee will stand by the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in applying reason as well as sympathy to this problem we can save the Government a great deal of much-needed money. In that way we can aid in recovery and our Budget will be balanced and people will feel secure that the Government is living within its means. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Members of this body to a few facts. The first one is that the people of the United States have a right to whatever they want. They have the duty then to pay for it. We talk about balancing the Budget. We are building up a condition here without going through with it. Of course, we can balance the Budget when we come to that, but we ought to see these simple things, and we ought to recognize them. We are partly out of the depression we went into in 1929 and 1930 only because we spent money and we are out of that depression only in proportion to the amount of money we have spent. We are going to get out of it completely only if we spend money to get out of it. If we do not, we are not going to get out. Instead of pinching and scrimping as we have done in the past, and the gentleman spoke of the so-called economy bill, which was rotten economy, we ought to get wise. If we want to balance the Budget—and we will in due course—we have to go about it in a different way. We can only do that if we are willing to increase the national income. When we increase the national income as we ought to do, as we can do, and as we must do, then we can balance the Budget. We can do that only if we spend money which will enable us to do that. When we get our national income to a sufficient size, then we can balance the Budget, and not until then. We are not going to be able to balance the Budget by pinching and scrimping. When we pinch and scrimp, such as we did through the economy bill, it is the worst thing we can do.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. We are telling private industry to shorten its hours and also to increase their wages and allow their people to live under decent living conditions. Yet in the Government we pay a starvation wage, we work the people 70 or 90 hours a week and say to them: "We are not going to give you any help at all. You are going to work 24 hours a day without any sleep", and give them a small per-diem allowance. We do not give them a break, in other words. That is what we do with our own employees, and we call that economy.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; we call it economy, but it is nonsense. It is a stultification of reason.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think for the purpose of clarification the philosophy as indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts should not be directed to this service, because these post-office inspectors are not paid starvation wages. They are paid very amply, and I cannot quite see the appropriateness of the gentleman's remarks as applied to this particular item.

Mr. KELLER. There are a lot of places in the Post Office Department where they are paid starvation wages.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am not challenging that statement, either; but later on we expect to remedy the situation in respect to the custodial employees. I do not understand the applicability of the gentleman's remarks to this particular service, however.

Mr. CONNERY. I may say the applicability is that the Pinkerton men who were sent to spy in the factories do not receive $2,600 or $3,500 a year. They get far more than that. Our inspectors, who are supposed to go and ferret out crime, are supposed to live munificently on $3,500 a year.

Mr. LUDLOW. They are getting the standardized wage of the Service.

Mr. CONNERY. It is too low.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. The representatives of the committee, who are ably presenting their case, emphasize the fact that we must economize. While I agree that economy is meritorious in many cases, let me recall a statement made by Postmaster General Bissel during the administration of President Cleveland at the time a crisis occurred in connection with Government appropriations and revenues. He said that it might be possible to economize in other departments of the Government, but the Post Office Department is one department in which economy of that nature cannot be practiced. This is a service that stimulates business. It renders service to the business of the country, and we ought to keep this Department up to par.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It is correct philosophy and correct common sense.

Mr. MEAD. If the gentleman will yield further, let me show him where he is right in attacking this policy of unwise economy.

In the 4 years after the depression, when business was dropping, the appropriations were in excess of $800,000,000—$820,000,000 in 1930, $839,000,000 in 1931, $841,000,000 in 1932, $805,000,000 in 1933, and now, when business is coming back, they cut the Department to $713,000,000 in 1934, $669,000,000 in 1935, $728,000,000 in 1936.

Mr. Chairman, look at this record: We handled 23,500,000,000 pieces of mail in 1936 as against 19,800,000,000 in 1933. I want economy, but, above all, Mr. Chairman, I want service for the people of our country, and we are not giving as good service as we should because in the past few years the Appropriations Committee have not been reporting appropriations of sufficient size.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman. The fact of the case is there are two kinds of economy, false economy and real economy. False economy is where we do foolish things or where we cut where we ought not to cut; where we deny ourselves the money to do the things that ought to be done. Good economy is the doing of those things that ought to be done.

Balancing of the Budget will come only when we increase our national income, and until we take measures to do this and until we continue along lines that have helped us in this direction in the past, we are going to get nowhere.

I only wish to call the attention of this Committee to a thing I have stated here before: Following the Civil War the indebtedness of the American Government amounted to 17½ percent of the entire national wealth at that time. At the present time it amounts to less than 8 percent of our national wealth. It does seem to me that since we did pay our indebtedness when it amounted to 17½ percent of our national wealth under conditions then existing, we ought not to be foolish enough to be worried or excited about balancing the Budget until we come to that in a natural and normal way. At the present time a man is producing three times as much wealth, man for man, as a man at the end of the Civil War was able to produce, and if we could pay 17½ percent of our national wealth in '65, we certainly can pay three times that proportion of our national wealth at the present time, and with exactly the same ease. We are simply running away from the common sense of the thing. We ought to increase our national income. We have got to do this, and we are going to do it, if we are wise, as I think we are. And we are not going to be scared into trying to balance a Budget by skimping and pinching. You cannot balance the Budget in that way. It will never be balanced in that way.

If you cut the appropriation of every department in the Government to half what they have had, it would not begin to balance your Budget. This is not the place to begin balancing the Budget. The place to begin is where we will be able to take in a larger amount of money by increasing the national income, and we cannot do it otherwise. What we ought to do is to establish real economy where it properly belongs and not allow false economy to delude us. We are going to go on spending money until we get out of our present condition, and then our national income will come up to what it ought to be, and then we can put our hands on the resources necessary to pay our debts. I do not know what has been the experience of other men, but mine has been that where I have been able to finance things well they have succeeded well, and where I have been compelled to do them on a shoestring they generally have not succeeded well. This is certainly true of government more than it is true of men. We ought to finance ourselves squarely. We ought to see where we are going today and how we are going to pay what we owe. We cannot do this by scrimping and pinching or by cutting the wages of our Government employees or by denying service to the people of this country. They have a right to the service they want, and they will kick about it if you do not give them the service. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is not a relief appropriation. It is a service appropriation for a service which is supposed to do work in carrying on one of those businesses in which the Government has had a monopoly ever since its foundation. It is not supposed to carry more funds than are needed to take care of this service. It is not supposed to provide jobs for relief cases.

The appropriations at the peak of the Government service, or in 1930, for this item, were $2,041,000. The amount carried in the bill as it stands is $2,234,500. This is the largest amount ever recommended by the Appropriations Committee for this particular service. It involves a service where we have made an increase every year. This makes the third year, and this year we are carrying an increase of five.

Now, what is the status of the situation with reference to the work of these people? It appears that the work with reference to crime is just about as it has been for a number of years, and that the number of cases in arrears is not substantially higher than it ordinarily is. It also appears that the regular inspection of post offices was right up to date on the 30th of last June. It appears right straight through that the investigations with reference to sites and that sort of thing are more with reference to sites for the smaller offices than previously, because the larger offices have been more nearly taken care of.

The increase of five inspectors here is a liberal increase from the standpoint of the needs of the Service.

Nowhere has this committee ever suggested a decrease in an appropriation unless it allowed enough, in its opinion, to take care of the needs of the Service, and in this particular case we have done this absolutely and fully.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. A number of gentlemen here today have rather forcefully arraigned our Postal Service. Does not the gentleman think that we have in America the finest Postal Service of any country on the face of the earth?

Mr. TABER. I think we have, and I think that we are providing sufficient funds to take care of that Service everywhere. There has been provision for increased personnel where increased personnel is needed, and here there has been exceedingly liberal increase considering the needs. On page 156 of the hearings we find that the number of recorded hours of overtime was 2,165, or 4 hours per year each for this Service.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, this is the second time that I have risen on this floor, and I think it is time for new Congressmen to be heard and state how they stand on the issues before this Government. Most of you Congressmen who came here did not come here because the job was handed to you, but you came here pledged that you would represent your district, this Government, and your State to the best of your ability, and yet you are sitting here without letting your voice be heard. Do you gentlemen know the amount recommended in this bill? It is $778,406,287. Yet you sit here and do not raise your voice in opposition to the increase in this bill. I am against this amendment. I cannot afford to vote to appropriate a larger amount of money than this bill asks for. This Government is going deeper and deeper into debt every day; therefore amendments and bills are brought to this House asking for various appropriations. I am not against the efficiency of the Post Office Department, and I agree, as the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] said a moment ago, we have the finest post-office system in the world. I am not rising in opposition to the efficiency of the Post Office Department. I am rising in opposition to this amendment, as we should put a check to additional appropriations to every bill brought to this House. What is going to become of the taxpayers of this country, with millions and millions of dollars being appropriated in this way? Where are you going to get the money? For one, I shall vote against this amendment to appropriate additional money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that one or two observations upon the question of this appropriation bill might not be out of order at this time. In the first place, let us start to clear up one or two things. In the first place, nobody is trying to starve the Post Office Department or hurt the Postal Service. That issue is not involved here. If it were, our genial friend from New York [Mr. MEAD], the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, instead of sitting there with his genial smile, would be down here in front tearing his hair, and I would agree with him. As I remarked to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]—and he agreed with me—aside from partisan considerations, we do have in America the finest, most efficient Postal Service of any nation on the face of the earth; and we want to keep it that way, and we propose to keep it that way. I should like to follow that statement further and pay tribute to the vast army of faithful, loyal employees in that Service. It is because of those employees that we have this perfect service. It is not possible always, Mr. Chairman, to do everything that we should like to do or to do everything that is desirable. Would it not be nice if you could trade in that "tin lizzie" your wife uses every year and get her a new car? Would it not be fine if you could get that new dress every time she wants one, and would it not be splendid if you could send that boy all the way through grammar school, through every college in the world and give him proper clothes and the riding horses that he wants? Is it any sign that you do not love him because you do not do that? That is the question here.

The function of the Committee on Appropriations is to do two things. First, to try to conserve the assets of this Nation.

Gentlemen may ridicule the idea of balancing the Budget if they please, but there is not a man on the floor of this House whose constituents do not expect him to try to save the taxpayers money when he can do it and try to conserve assets and, on the other hand, to adequately appropriate for governmental functions. The committee is doing that. This bill has $2,000,000 more in it this year than it had last year. The Postal Service is going ahead, it is progressing—perhaps not so fast as the bureau chiefs and the departmental heads would like to have it, but you know you never can do that. This Congress can never appropriate as much as these bureau chiefs and departmental heads would like to have us do. What can we do? We can try to find the right of the thing after careful study. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and his colleagues on this subcommittee have done, I think, a grand job of it; and I hope the membership of this House today on these amendments will back up this subcommittee and help to bring out a bill here that appropriates enough money for the Department. There is no use dumping unnecessary funds on them.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. The gentleman made reference to the wife and the tin Lizzie, or trading in the tin Lizzie. The gentleman undoubtedly has been driving a car for many years. I am just wondering if it is not better economy to trade in that tin Lizzie rather than drive it too long.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; but you cannot trade it in every year, as your wife would like to have you do just because the Joneses have a new one. You have got to pay some attention to your income. My friend knows that one cannot take a vacation every time one gets the urge to go somewhere. If you did, where would you be? We have done a pretty good job so far in spending a great deal of money, but the time has come when we really ought to consider the question of outgo and income.

Mr. BEITER. I do not say the car ought to be traded in every year, but it should be traded in every other year. It would create more jobs. This is not a second-hand country.

Mr. WOODRUM. We do that; we trade them in every 2 or 3 years; and the Post Office Department has received increases. There is an increase in this particular item of $400,000 since 1930.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts:

Page 55, strike out lines 2, 3, and 4, and insert in lieu thereof "Salaries of inspectors: For salaries of post-office inspectors, $2,377,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 23, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Compensation to assistant postmasters: For compensation to assistant postmasters at first- and second-class post offices, $6,925,000.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 57, line 2, after the word "offices", strike out "$6,925,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,100,000."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item, which pertains to pay of assistant postmasters in the second-class offices of the country, the appropriation requested by the Department was reduced by the Budget Bureau, and further reduced by the Appropriations Committee to $6,925,000.

There are 1,772 second-class offices which have no assistant postmasters. The Department believes that all of these places should be filled, and there is ample law for making the assignments. The Department's request was very modest and moderate—that it be given sufficient money to fill 100 of these 1,772 vacancies. The amount allowed by the Budget would permit filling 60 of these positions, while the amount allowed by the committee would permit filling only 30.

These promotions, Mr. Chairman, would go to deserving clerks at small second-class offices and would mean a promotion of $100 a year, or from $2,100 to $2,200. In the larger cities the postmasters are permitted to promote men by making them special clerks at $2,200 and $2,300, but this is the only avenue open for the smaller offices to promote clerks with meritorious records.

I appeal to the Members in the name of these employees in the smaller offices of the country. I appeal to you in behalf of the Department that made the original request for this appropriation. We ought to make a start as suggested by the committee, but let us make a substantial start and allow for the promotion of 100 of these employees. Let us approve the amendment and make it possible to advance 100 men to the office of assistant postmaster where these offices are authorized by law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is an instance of adding to the annual charge on the taxpayers of the country $175,000 that is not necessary in the public service. These offices are all second-class offices. The fact is that a great many of these offices have been functioning very admirably and to the complete satisfaction of the public without any assistant postmaster.

The Budget estimate provided for the filling of 60 of these offices.

We thought we were exceedingly liberal in this matter and in harmony with the best interest of the public service in allowing 30. There is provision in this bill to take care of all promotions of assistant postmasters that will come about automatically by the increase in the postal receipts. This item goes exclusively to the question of how many of these vacancies we shall fill. The service has been running along without impairment to the public service. We felt that in the interest of economy we could allow 30. I do not think we should allow an additional $175,000.

Mr. BEITER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEITER. Does the gentleman have the number of hours these men work overtime and for which they receive no pay?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not think it is any different in their case from other employees of the Government.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is it not true this item was increased $150,000 over the 1937 estimate?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is absolutely true. We allowed an increase of $150,000, which was only $75,000 less than the Budget estimate.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman from New York stated these men worked overtime. They are clerks under the civil service, and they cannot work overtime unless they get paid.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD)—ayes 26, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, first- and second-class post offices: For compensation to clerks and employees at first- and second-class post offices, including auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter post offices, printers, mechanics, skilled laborers, watchmen, messengers, laborers, and substitutes, $195,000,000.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:
